EDITOR FRANK IRVINE.

In Sunset, a fine tribute is paid to Frank Irvine, editor of the Portland Journal, and brother of County Commissioner J. D. Irvine, Albany people will be interested in reading. Here it is:

It was at a banquet that I heard him speak. Instantly there was a pull at my heart-strings. The man who sat next me leaned forward that not a word of the deep, rich voice, so thrillingly earnest, should be lost. Others near by sat tense. A shock of graying hair brushed high from a thin, sensitive face, deep-lined, and hands that seemed to make pictures, so eloquent they were—the speaker was unusually impressive. He gathered you up and brought you close. And the more he talked, the nearer you got to him and to the big things he was talking about.

"Who is he?" I whispered to the man next me, as the audience broke into applause so prolonged that the speaker had to pause in his delivery. "He might be a burden and a care to his family, isolate from the world of affairs; he might be selling newspapers on the corner, or standing with a monkey and a hand-organ to receive the pennies of the benevolent. But he isn't. You see what he is. But what you haven't noticed is that he is—blind!" "Blind?" I gasped. "Tell me who he is."

"He is Frank Irvine, editor of the Oregon Journal—a formidable fighter for clean government, good roads, open waterways and fine citizenship. He is a splendid writer but, no matter how splendid his editorial, it shrinks into very ordinary stuff beside the story that Frank Irvine could write about—himself."

"That's the way his townsmen feel about him. All sorts of people know Frank Irvine and look up to him. He makes contemptible all the trifling troubles that so many of us parade as an excuse for failure. He is a rebuke to the "quitter." No gloom, no brooding, no impatience! Just pluck and faith! A living monument of what a man may do without eyes!"

"I don't like the morgue aspect," Frank Irvine says; "I can't endure the graveyard atmosphere. The joy of life is the most wonderful thing that one human being can bring another. When I am at home with nothing to do, I go out into my garden. Yes, I have a lovely garden that I tend myself. That's where the joy comes in having a garden."

He dances too, does Frank Irvine. He is an adept at the fox trot, though he adds, "To my mind, a hesitation is the most interesting of the new dances. But I can dance the Peter Panga-votte to a fare-you-well. There is no foot-work worth while that I cannot do. And I enjoy jumping rope at the beach."

With a tragedy as his perpetual background, Frank Irvine sits at his typewriter—the greatest optimist among us. To him life is a beautiful adventure. He makes it a beautiful adventure.

Fate tied a bandage around his eyes, but he was bigger than Fate. He found that the loveliest things of all are seen from the soul.
