SATURDAY NIGHT THOUGHTS

Nothing ameliorating appears in connection with the war. Each day brings renewed agony. The morning sees the things of the previous day repeated more vigorously, if possible. Reports that slip through the censor's tell of horrors unspeakable. Man's inhumanity to man is rampant all over Europe. If Satan gets anywhere near the scenes of action he must be ashamed of himself for being there.

As Thanksgiving day approaches it is certainly a great thing for the United States to be able to find itself with the dove of peace flopping her wings over the nation. The people of this country have much to be thankful for. It should be our purpose to do things in a manner to promote peace in the future, not the things that call for trouble.

A case that has excited national interest is that of the birth of a child in the East, which was fearfully deformed. The physicians declared that it was an act of mercy to allow it to die, as life would be one continual horror. This was done. Some raised up in arms and declared that would be murder. But it was not. It was an act of mercy, something that rose above the technicalities of the law. A slight deformity would not be occasion for such a thing; but one pronounced as this one called for the action taken.

An interesting thing in this state is the uprising against high taxes. All over the state there is something being heard. The situation is an interesting one. There is occasion for the movement. No government has right to make taxation burdensome. Taxes are not for that purpose. They should be kept within a certain limit. When they get beyond a certain figure there should be a halt. It is true that people are continually crying for progress and improvement, which is right, and they should be taken into account, but held with a firm rein.

The end of this week sees the most fiercely contested game of football of the season in progress, the one between two rival colleges. The feeling is intense, every muscle strained to the limit as old friends plunge into each other for touchdowns. From a school standpoint these are great battles; but from a permanent physical standpoint it is doubtful if the result justifies the risk. However rough, it is a fact that the game has become almost a science, and for generalship nothing else in sport approaches it.
