HILL SAW AHEAD.

Kansas City Star: As an engineering feat a railroad is not more difficult to build than a smokestack, but smokestack builders are not usually James J. Hills. The reason is obvious. It requires no imagination to build a smokestack. It requires no pioneering. They are not built out on a prairie and allowed to stand there until a factory comes along and hitches on.

Something like that was done by Mr. Hill when he pushed the Great Northern out from St. Paul. What use is a railroad in a country without population? What can it haul, where can it haul it and from whom? These are questions Hill probably heard asked many times, and one may suppose he was too busy pushing his rails through the empty and silent northwest to stop to answer them. But the answer, if he made it, was that he was building not a railroad, but an empire. His road was merely an agency, a means to an end. He saw that end because had the imagination to see it. It was easy enough to see after the territory was peopled, when great cities had sprung up and nearly one-half million farm were under cultivation in the Great Northern's empire. Everybody saw it then, but "Jim" Hill saw it when there was nothing there to see. That is why he was a great railroad builder. If he had been less he would have built his road between two established markets, paralleling competing lines, and fought for scraps.

But Hill didn't build his road and wait for business to come. He took business out into the Northern's territory and planted it there. He made every acre in his empire work for his road. He peopled it, stocked it, planted it. It took imagination to spend $30,000 a mile to build a railroad that apparently got farther away from anywhere every mile it lengthened. It took imagination to see the time when the unbroken prairie would be waving in wheat for the road to haul to market. It took imagination to see the road at tidewater unloading steel from Pittsburgh on ships found for the Orient. It took imagination to see branch lines bringing down lumber from the northern forests to give the road a return haul east. Yet all of these things James J. Hill saw, and saw them while they were yet far off.

That is when all men of imagination see things—ahead of their fellows. That is the reason they succeed. The men who didn't see what Hill saw would have liked very much to buy his road afterwards. Such a one was Harriman. Harriman is known as a great railroad man. He was, but he was not a pioneer. He was a rebuildler. He took the Union Pacific when it was bankrupt, and by spending millions, made it a profitable enterprise, yielding large returns for himself and the men who had faith in him. He went out of the range of railroad development, which Hill never did, and embarked in gigantic speculation.

The Hill fortune was rooted in the ground. His work is likewise rooted and will grow. The empire he opened up will continue to send its wealth out to the world and the road he built will continue to take its toll of it. There could be no better example of the fruits of a builder's imagination. The average business man thinks his business is to sell the goods he deals in to such customers as happen to pass his door. The exceptional business man—the one with vision, the James J. Hill of his line—helps his city to bring more people. The more who come—whether attracted by the beauty of its park, the excellence of its transportation system or the cheapness of its utilities—the more customers will pass its doors. The business man and the city who master that reciprocal principle have mastered the secret of James J. Hill.
