Storing Batteries Dry Is Recommended Autoists

To the car owner who contemplates storing his car during the winter, the problem of caring for his storage battery presents itself. It is not enough to merely take the battery off the car and put it in a place where it cannot freeze for even when it is not in use the battery is slowly discharging itself. If, therefore, the owner does not give his battery definite attention during the winter, he is likely to find it dead when he comes to use it in the spring.

Storing the storage battery at the battery service station is by far the best solution to the storage problem. In the Willard Service Station, located at 218 West Second St., two kinds of storage are offered to the car owner, namely, wet storage and dry storage.

Leaving the battery in wet storage means simply that the car owner is leaving his battery in charge of the battery experts who see that it is fully charged and kept in that condition, that it is filled with distilled water at regular periods and that the best of care is taken of it during the winter.

Wet storage, however, is not entirely satisfactory. The Willard Storage Battery Company does not at all recommend it for batteries that are over a year old or that have seen hard service. The reason for this is that when the battery is in wet storage, natural deterioration is all the time going on, just as it is when the battery is on the car. In the ordinary course of events the insulation in a battery is going to break down sooner or later and this might happen during the period that the battery is in wet storage. The insulation then would have to be entirely renewed to make the battery serviceable and even were this done there would be some question as to whether the plates would be in good condition for another season's service.

Dry storage is by far the more satisfactory means of storing. The battery is completely disassembled and the elements removed from the cells, cured and put in a dry place, to be re-assembled in the spring. Obviously this is the one form of storage in which the wear on the battery is absolutely stopped. If for no other reason, this should recommend it to the automobile owner.

In tearing down the battery the expert will be able to tell its condition without a doubt; he can determine whether it is fit for service without further attention or whether repairs, if any, are necessary.

If the battery is stored dry it is fitted with new insulation in the spring and this method insures the owner satisfactory service when the battery is again put into commission.

Full explanations will be gladly given at the Auto Electric Shop, 118 West Second street.

"The Winning of Barbara Worth"

"The Winning of Barbara Worth", Harold Bell Wright's novel, which had such an immense sale in the United States and Canada, and which is probably the most popular of all the novels written by the author of "The Shepherd of the Hills", has been dramatized by Mark Swan. A massive and beautiful production of the play, presented by a carefully selected cast will be seen at the Globe Theatre next Friday Dec. 8. This is the only company presenting this play in either the United States or Canada, consequently the original production is guaranteed. Seats now on sale at the Globe.
