A MASTER STROKE

The ultimate success of the allied cause depends, in my judgement upon our solving the tonnage difficulties with which we are confronted.

The above statement was made by Lloyd George and the question raised by him is answered by the American government through the plan yesterday announced by the shipping board and approved by President Wilson.

In brief the plan provides for the construction of 3000 small wooden steamships to be used in transporting food and war munitions to the allied governments. The first thousand ships will be completed within eighteen months and the entire three thousand within another two years. They will be of three thousand gross tons and have a speed of ten knots per hour.

Each ship is to be manned by a trained gun crew, equipped with wireless apparatus and anti-submarine guns.

By taking the above step the United States will provide herself and her allies with sufficient tonnage to carry on the war indefinitely, despite the German submarine campaign, and at the same time provide the nucleus for an American merchant marine. It is a master stroke delivered at the right time by a nation which stands ready to render practical assistance to her comrades in arms and is financially able to carry her plans to a successful conclusion.

There is another side of the question however which should be greeted with approval by the people of Oregon. According to the announcement seventy per cent of the ships constructed the first year are to be built on the Pacific coast. This will prove a tremendous trade stimulus. Thousands of workmen will be employed and the long looked for wave of prosperity which has been headed toward the coast for several months is due to strike the coast the moment ship building activities commence on a large scale.

Five cents will buy one and one-half pounds of potatoes. Every potato is three fourths water—their food value is low.
