HOW LONG OUGHT A BATTERY TO LAST

"This question," says Mr. Preston, the local Willard expert, "is asked me more frequently, perhaps, than any other by car-owners. And it is a question to which a definite answer is impossible."

"This one thing is certain. Batteries do wear out and the length of service they give to the car-owner is dependent almost entirely upon the care which the car-owner gives them."

"A battery that is absolutely neglected by its owner and at the same time called upon for heavy service, may be ruined inside of two months. On the other hand a battery that is well cared for by its owner, that is looked into by a battery expert regularly, taking promptly the 'stitch in time that saves nine,' may give satisfactory service as long as two or two-and-one-half years."

"To get the longest possible life out of his battery the car-owner when he gets his new machine, should take it to a battery expert, have it tested to see that it is in tip-top condition to start, tell the expert something of the conditions of service under which it will have to stand up and keep in touch with the expert for two or three months. In this way the car-owner is instructed in the care of the battery and since he is in constant touch with the battery expert, such minor adjustments as are necessary in the battery and generating equipment can be made."

LEONARDO'S STYLE OF ART.

"Mona Lisa" is No Mystery, According to Kenyon Cox.

Leonardo da Vinci was a tireless student of all kinds of natural phenomena, and of many things he had learned a great deal that has been rediscovered only in our own time. Among other things, as his notebooks prove, he had studied effects of transmitted and reflected light, understood the difference between diffused daylight and sunlight with its crisp edged shadows, saw the blue shadow which has been introduced into modern painting by the impressionists and knew the reason of it.

He attempted none of these things in painting, and he tells us why. These things, he says, after a long description of the effects of sunlight upon foliage—of the color of the sky in the high lights, of the yellow light where the sun shines through the leaf and the interruption of this light where the shadow of one leaf falls upon another—these things should not be painted "because they confuse the form."

The Florentine ideal in art was the utmost realization of form. Leonardo was a true Florentine, and he introduced into painting just so much of light and shade as should assist in this realization, no more. It is his use of modeling that is his most personal contribution to art.

Much rhapsodical nonsense has been written about the "Mona Lisa" and her enigmatic smile, and there have been endless speculations as to her character and the meaning of her expression. It is all beside the mark. The truth is that the "Mona Lisa" is a study of modeling, little more. Leonardo had discovered that the expression of smiling is much more a matter of the modeling of the cheek and of the forms below the eye than of the change in the line of the lips. It interested him, with his new power of modeling, to produce a smile wholly by these delicate changes of surface, hence the mysterious expression.

Poets may find "La Gioconda" a vampire or what not. To artists with a sense of form her portrait will always be a masterpiece because it is one of the subtlest and most exquisite pieces of modeling in existence.—Kenyon Cox in Scribner's.
