TRAINING THE CHILD.

The Most Essential Factor is in Having a Normal Home.

A student of sociology recently said in a public address that the most essential thing in the training of a child was a normal home. This sort of home ought to be common. Yet investigations show that a large number of homes must be considered abnormal. Such are poverty stricken, overcrowded homes, and such are the servant filled homes of the wealthy. It is the large well to do middle class who should and who do supply most of the so called normal homes.

It has been found that many homes which might be normal are not so and that the parents usually are to blame. Parents are quarrelsome, a favored child is allowed to bully the household, the mother is indifferent to the home, the father is easily disciplined, too lax, the children are ignored, parents reverse each other's decisions—these are signs of abnormal homes.

Some. They are defects which are singled out because they betray no gross weakness in the parents and could be eliminated by a little patience and thoughtful effort.

The environment of a child in its early years undoubtedly has a good deal to do with forming its character. It seems as if parents ought to heed this fact and to exercise such self denial and self control as may be necessary to make the home a place where the child can be sure of finding peace and just treatment. There are many homes that for familiar reasons are entirely without the scope of these considerations.

But the observations noted apply with reasonable pertinence to the numerous American homes in which the parents are well behaved and self respecting, but who are too selfish or too thoughtless to give due attention to the very important matter of providing a tranquil and helpful home for the little ones.—Rochester Democrat and Chronicle.

James Goddard

Chicago Grand Opera Star Coming to Chautauqua

THE Ellison-White Chautauqua System announces the engagement of James Goddard, bass-baritone, one of the world's greatest operatic celebrities, for their western circuit of Chautauqua this year.

Goddard comes to Chautauqua after the most brilliant season of his career with the Chicago Grand Opera Company, where he has starred jointly with Geraldine Farrar, Olive Fremstad, Julia Claussen, MacLennan and other world figures of the concert and operatic stage.

Goddard's career has been meteoric. In 1911 the great Jean de Reszke heard him at his Paris debut and prophesied him the legitimate successor of Edouard de Reszke. From Paris Goddard's fame spread to conservative England, where at Covent Garden, London, the singer's astonishing power drew the eyes of Vienna critics. Here he entered into a six year contract with the Royal Grand Opera, which the outbreak of the war dissolved. Upon returning to America Goddard was immediately engaged by Campanini, impresario of the Chicago Grand Opera Company, where he remains one of the most valued members of the Association.

Goddard receives faultless support at the hands of two noted artists, Miss Ruth Ray, violinist, and Mr. Robert Yale Smith, pianist.
