WOMEN OF RUSSIANOT ARGUING VOTING

By William G. Shepherd, United Press Staff Correspondent

Petrograd, May 1.—(By Mail)—Mrs. C. Russian People stands side by side with her husband in this revolution. She speaks at meetings, votes, leads and writes for the scores of little newspapers that have sprung up all over Russia, just as if she were an ordinary male human being. In the simple, child-like Russian mind, no question seems to have arisen as to the rights of women. When I asked whether she would vote in the new Russia, the Russian women realized immediately that I was either an Englishman or an American. "Why there's no question about it," said one Russian woman, shrugging her shoulders. "We've had bigger things to fight for in Russia than the right to vote. We've fought side by side with the men for human rights with no question of sex involved. We have gone to jail, and we've died and we've taken our turns at assassinations. Only an Anglo-Saxon, if you'll pardon me for plain speaking, would think of raising such a question."

The answer was calculated to make an Anglo-Saxon feel like a wife-beater.

"I approached four of the women who sat at the various committee tables around the duma building and plainly put to each one of the question: 'Madame, have you ever been in jail?' They have—all four of them. They told their stories with proud smiles. They had not been prisoners in the Cat and Mouse fashion in which the suffragettes of London have been jailed, nor in the spot-light manner in which Mrs. Sanger and the birth-control advocates in New York have lingered for a few weeks at a time behind bars—but in the way of the Russian Czar, with cold, dark cells and silence; little food and long, lonely, hopeless years of waiting.

"Has any woman in Russia ever been put in jail for demanding women's rights?" I asked one of these women who had been jailed for a part in the Stolypin assassination. She was sitting in the office of the new national peasants' union, presiding over the book in which the incoming peasant delegates from every part of Russia were entering their names.

"Never! Never!" she said emphatically. "That's one crime that has never been charged against the Czar. But we Russian women haven't been like the American and English women. The rights of all human beings, men and women, have been at stake in Russia and men and women have been fighting side by side for them. All of us men and women, have considered ourselves as human beings without any sex differences. Now that the revolution is won, men and women are still side by side. Nobody has raised the question of women's rights in the revolution until you American and English newspaper men came along."

"But are you women sure that you will be allowed to vote in the new government?"

"Why, just as sure as the men are. The question isn't even raised, I tell you. It hasn't occurred to anybody that the women might not vote."
