NORWAY ASKS HELP

Among the various national commissions trading on each other's heels in Washington is one soon to arrive from Norway. It comes to plead with our government for liberal exports of grain. There is only one country where Norway has a chance of getting the wheat, corn and oats that she needs, and that is the United States.

The commission will be received with respect but with no great amount of enthusiasm. It isn't an opportune time for any neutral country to come begging for grain, when we haven't nearly enough for the imperative needs of our allies. And most Americans will find it hard to see any reason why, in dividing up our small surplus, we should favor Norway. Not that we have any particular grievance against that country; but if "the Lord helps them that help themselves," we may be pardoned for adopting the same attitude. Norway seems to have invited the predicament in which she now finds herself.

Norway has, during the war, exported large quantities of foodstuffs and war material to Germany. When Germany started sinking neutral shipping she made no exception of Norway. The U-boats have sunk nearly 300 Norwegian merchantmen since the beginning of the present year. They sent 49 to the bottom last month. On one day of this month, five more ships were blown up by the Germans. And Norway has kept right on sending to Germany the nickel used in making the torpedoes that blow up her own ships.

Norway cannot fight Germany, but Norway may at least be expected to resent the destruction of her merchant fleet and to stop aiding the ruthless power that destroys them. She will have to show a different spirit if she expects help from us.

"HER FATHER'S KEEPER" A PLAY OF FEMINISM

Whether or not a girl can enter the business world and attain success without losing her feminine charm is the issue involved in "Her Father's Keeper," a Triangle play, which will be shown at the Globe theatre today and Saturday.

Irene Howley is seen as the girl who tires of motoring, dancing and gracing social functions. She possesses the business acumen of her father, a Wall street financier, and she desires to enter his office. He refuses to permit her and declares he will never speak to her again if she persists in following a career. But his determination is matched by his daughter. She disappears from home and later emerges as a secretary in his office.

A clever use is made of the dictaphone in the office scenes. The obdurate father, having declared he will not address his daughter again, uses this apparatus for dictating letters to her.

The ninth episode of the "Mystery of the Double Cross" gets Peter Hale in deeper trouble than ever and the Masked Stranger is right on the job. Phillipa Brewster becomes more of a puzzle than ever and Bridgley Bentley seems to be getting a little the worst of the deal.

There is also a comedy of merit in "A Finished Product," a regular bundle of laughs.
