THE SUFFRAGE MARTYRS

Women have been said to have a natural liking for martyrdom. It must be so with radical suffragists, at any rate. The representatives of the Congressional Union have kept right on picketing the White House regardless of arrests, times and imprisonment, not to mention the assaults of indignant fellow-women and the jeers of amused men. They seem to thrive on opposition just as the British militants did.

But there are differences between England's militants and ours. The former were taken seriously. They made John Bull tremendously angry. Ours are merely laughed at. Seeking to be heroic, they only make themselves ridiculous.

And then, the British militants proved when war came, that they deserved the name. They jumped in and helped their men folk fight the common foe. Ours merely make a little harder the lot of men charged with the heaviest responsibilities any administration has had since the civil war.

They'd better be knitting socks or rolling bandages. Or sitting in rocking chairs with their hands folded. Meanwhile the suffrage cause continues to gain strength in spite of all this silly "martyrdom" because the great mass of American suffragists are sensible and patriotic enough to repudiate it.

TRAINING PUBLIC SERVANTS

Training for public service is coming to be definitely recognized as the best way to attain the highest kind of service. Gradually the state universities and private colleges are establishing departments especially devoted to such instruction.

Government administration is a more difficult task today than it has been in the past. The problems must play a smaller part in the actual administration of the people's affairs. Party ties and prejudices must give way to ability and efficiency.

The University of Wisconsin is about to open a public service training school. It will be one of several institutions, among them the University of Texas, Western Reserve University, Columbia University and the College of the City of New York that have endorsed such work.

The National Society for the Promotion of Training for Public Service is pushing the work everywhere. It seems assured that the idea will spread and that more and more young men and women looking toward public careers will have to train for them as carefully as lawyers and physicians train for their work.

There will be the danger of specializing too soon, of narrowing the educational foundation of the public servant. Making the student get out with public officials and study actual concrete problems as they are being handled in everyday life will do much to keep a sane balance between academic theories and the realities of administration. On the whole, the good that will be accomplished by such training seems to outweigh the danger of developing an over-expert body of officials.
