CHAMBERLAIN IS RIGHT

When Senator McNary brought up his amendment appropriating $200,000 to build new irrigation projects under the provision of the reclamation law, nearly every Western Senator voted for it; Senator Chamberlain spoke and voted against it.

The amendment referred to was a rider which Senator McNary proposed to tack onto the food control bill. It was legislation of a special character and for a special section which had no immediate relation to the vital and all-absorbing question of the conservation of the nation's food supply.

Had it been introduced as a separate bill it would have unquestionably received the enthusiastic and unqualified support of Senator Chamberlain. Injected as it was into the food control legislation it threatened to delay its passage and possibly defeat one of the most necessary and urgent pieces of war legislation presented during the present session of congress.

Bills for meritorious irrigation projects in western states, like those for the improvement of toy streams and the erection of federal buildings in doubtful districts, must stand on their merits, and not be plastered onto the war bills, if their friends expect the support which they otherwise might deserve.

The food control bill was in personal charge of Senator Chamberlain. He was the author and represented the administration on the floor of the Senate. It was a great and important piece of national legislation which had been entrusted to his charge. Delay would have been disastrous and failure a crime.

DELL BLANETT REJECTED

Dell Blannett, who was the first recruit for Troop D, reported last evening for physical examination and was rejected by the examining doctor. This means that he is officially released from his obligations and oath, and puts to an end a controversy that has been agitating the troop ever since the captaincy election. Blannett arrived last evening from Kalispell, Montana, where he had staged a wild west show and reported immediately to the examining doctor. His rejection resulted from injuries sustained in past accidents of the arena and track.—Pendleton East Oregonian.
