CONSCRIPTION IN CANADA

Opponents of our selective draft made much of the fact that Canada had not sanctioned conscription. Of all the nations engaged in the war for democracy, Canada is most like us. If Canada would not stand for the draft, it was argued, when she had so much at stake, why should we?

But that argument is now valueless. The Canadian parliament has declared for universal compulsory military training and service. It would have done so long ago but for the French "Nationalists" of Quebec, a numerous and conservative racial element, which has never forgiven its mother country for the radical excesses of the French revolution, and has never amalgamated with the British. The Quebec French still object to conscription, but their voice is silenced. The more progressive French-Canadians of provinces farther west are for compulsory service.

There was never so much reason for conscription in Canada as in the United States. The Canadians have volunteered on a scale that puts us to shame. With about one-twelfth of our population, the Dominion has raised more recruits by voluntary enlistment than we have. If we did as well proportionately, we could put more than 6,000,000 men into the field without resorting to the draft.

FRANCE IN THE FIELD THOROUGHLY PREPARED

By Henry Wood, United Press Staff Correspondent

With the French Armies, July 31.—In three titanic forms of warfare imposed the past year by the imperial forces of imperial Germany on the democratic armies of democratic France, the latter have established and maintained an ever increasing ascendancy.

The significance of this fact for humanity at large exceeds a thousand times the mere military value it may have in eventually winning the war.

The third year of the war has marked the supreme test before the tribunal of the world—before the tribunal of all mankind—of the superiority of democratic over imperialistic forces. And by "forces" is not meant mere armies.

The year was one in which every force—intellectual, material, and physical—that an imperialistic empire was capable of inspiring and producing, was massed against the same supreme forces as inspired and created by a democracy in one great struggle for the survival of the fittest. And France—ever the first champion of democracies—has justified the fitness of democracies to survive.

The test was one that could come only with a fair degree of equity during the third year of the war. It was only then that France, inspired for a quarter of a century previous by the democratic ideals of peace, was able to enter the arena with all the forces of her natural life mobilized and turned into a single military aim. Germany had begun the war two years previously with this advantage already established by forty years of imperialistic ambitions and prepartions.

While with the opening of the third year of the war, Germany unquestionably still had material advantage due to this long, intensive preparation, yet at that time both France and Germany had at least brought into play the highest forces that a democratic national life was capable of producing and opposing to those of the maximum imperialistic inspiration.

The third year of the war opened with this democratic and imperialistic contrast even more pronounced in the field of military operations than elsewhere. Against the generals commanding the French armies—generals whose whole military education, ideals, and aims had those of a democracy—was ranged the German armies commanded in almost every instance by German princes and sovereigns inspired by the highest imperialistic ambition, training and beliefs.

The third year of the war entered with two great battles already in progress—each representing a different form of warfare and a form which the Germans themselves by their superior preparation had been able at will to impose on France. At Verdun it was the war of siege; on the Somme, the war of trenches.

For five months and a half preceding the third anniversary of the war the French at Verdun had held out against the Germans perfected methods of siege warfare, such as they might have employed at Paris, but for the battle of the Marne. The first of August, 1916, marked the passing there of Germany's greatest effort and the gradual retaking by the French of the offensive. For the first four months of the third year of the war the Germans were slowly driven back from the points where they had nearest attained Verdun, and then in two astounding assaults, one on Nov. 24, and the other on December 15, in which not only the genius of the democratic military commanders of France but the glory of her democratic armies as well, reached their highest expression of the entire war, the French completely liberated their fortress.
