southern Senators in the fight over means of knowing where Brother Ingalls obtained his information but we are quite certain that it was not gleaned from the congress onal rec-that Senator Chamberlain voted against the McNary amendment to the food control bill for substantially the same reasons that he vot ed against an amendment which emanated from one of the southern Senators and had the backing of the solid South. The bill proposed to appropriate several million dollars for fertilizer which would have been used largely in the southern states.

Senator Chamberlain had a job to perform. His job was to pass the times, food control bill and to successfully plunge. accomplish his purpose it was necessary to prevent, insofar as possible

That he was forced to step upon the pet measures of his western and south ern colleagues does not necessarily mean that the bills were lacking in merit but that they were proposed as an amendment to an administration war bill at a time when its passage was hanging in the balance and the country was clamoring for action. They should have been introduced as separate measures and been permitted

It was incredible that the United States Senate should continue in this critical juncture playing politics and letting itself be pulled and hauled by selfish and conflicting business interests. The food supply of the nation was at stake. The life of our allies and of the whole allied cause was at stake.

depends primarily on whether the ulations of the allied countries can be fed through the coming year. We have the food, supplied by the loyal efforts of our farmers, with the help of Providence. And while Congress dawdled and quarrelled and procrastinated that food was beginning to rot and waste and pass into the hands of the speculators.

Instead of an adequate system of public control, insuring that all our foodstuifs will be reaped, transported, conserved and distributed in fair portions and at fair prices to the millions who need them, we had chaos in the national capitol.

the formidable foe of procrastination and delay. He was one member of aside all political considerations and voted for the greatest good of the greatest number. If this be deserving of criticism, in the name of Heaven, let us revise our version of true pat-
