LIBERTY LAUNDERING

One of the most entertaining schemes for luring surplus savings into the nation's war fund is being used by a certain laundry "somewhere in America." The force of its appeal is proved by the testimony of a citizen who until recently had successfully dodged his patriotic duty.

"The Liberty Loan has been chasing my bankroll so hotly during the last few days," he reports, "that it has become a veritable nightmare, a black spectre that drives sleep from my pillow. I awoke with a start the other morning, reflecting optimistically that after all it was only a dream, and that I would hear nothing more about the Liberty Loan until after breakfast, at any rate."

"But just as I started to don a freshly laundered shirt, a slip printed in large, red letters fell from it and lay, face upward, on the floor. It read:

BUY LIBERTY BONDS because if the Kaiser wins the war GOOD NIGHT, SHIRT!

"Now, what do you think of that?" Well, if he asks us, we think it's never an effective, though possibly a bit broader in phraseology than some delicate souls may like. If the Kaiser wins the war, he might really feel disposed to strip this country, even to the shirt on Uncle Sam's back. The dodging citizen referred to has now done what he could to save his own shirt. He's bought a bond.
