MILITARY HEALTH

There has been considerable civilian worry about our soldiers' health. Some of it has been based on the congressional investigation showing a lack of proper clothing in certain camps, and some of it on army health reports giving the number of cases of pneumonia, measles, etc.
It may be taken for granted that the worry has certainly not been due to the appearance of army recruits on their home visits. Nearly every one must have remarked the big improvement in bearing, color and general appearance after the men have been soldiers for a few weeks or months.

With hardly an exception, the returning lads are transparently vigorous and healthy. And in most cases they have gained weight. Major General Murfin, of the surgeon general's office, says that the selective service men in general have gained five to ten pounds since they entered upon their military life. In some cantonments the gain is said to average nearly 15 pounds. And it's not adipose tissue, but good, hard, red muscle.

Regular habits, wholesome exercise and nourishing food do it. The improvement is much like that usually observed in college freshmen at institutions where there is good food, obligatory exercise and a proper amount of discipline.

But what about the lack of overcoats and the hospital lists? It cannot be denied that warm clothing was not supplied promptly enough in some camps, that many soldiers were attacked by pneumonia unnecessarily, that measles and some other contagious diseases were allowed to make inexcusable headway. Many men have been sick who should not have been. Some have died who should not have died. Some of the cantonments have fallen short of army standards, which are extremely high.
But when we apply normal standards, there's more cause for admiration than criticism. The average soldier has enjoyed better health than the average civilian. Most of the men are in better shape this minute than they ever were before. The life is good for them, and should be increasingly good as early defects are remedied.

TURNING BARS INTO SODA FOUNTAINS

Two years ago foresight caused the proprietor of one of the largest and most remunerative barrooms in New Orleans to install a soda fountain in the arcade leading to the bar. At the same time he opened a restaurant not connected with the saloon. And now with both these enterprises already developed into paying businesses this same saloon proprietor has announced that the bar will give place to a still larger soda fountain within sixty days. Oh yes, of course he's enlarging the restaurant, too.
Why? He gives the answer himself quite frankly. "This country will be dry in five years, and by that time I will not notice the loss of the saloon."

Other saloons in the same city are making plans to do likewise. Soda fountains, restaurants, a cafeteria and an oyster counter are among the enterprises being started as the prohibition amendment brings the prospects of a dry country nearer.

Brewers and distillers in dry states have long since found profitable employment for their plants in lines of production too numerous to mention. Saloon keepers aren't going to find it difficult to be cheerful about closing their barrooms because, after all, there are other money-making occupations in which they may safely indulge.

Honey and syrups instead of sugar will make victory just as sweet and bring it sooner.
