ROTTEN DISCIPLINE

One of the war stories going the rounds is of the soldier boy home on furlough from one of the training camps, who watched his father's efforts to get small brother to do one of his daily chores. First the father requested, then cajoled, and ended by bribing the youngster to do his duty. "The discipline in this house is certainly rotten!" exclaimed the soldier. It's right in line with the stories of the boys from New York's east side who came home from camp and insisted upon clearing out the bathtubs of coal, groceries or the small child's bedding in order that they might be used for baths. This created disturbance in the home. It caused argument and tearful pleading on the part of the mothers. But sternly and firmly camp standards prevailed. "Bath-tubs for baths!" was the successful war cry.

All over the country the same thing is happening. The boys home on short leaves after a few months of army discipline are spreading the tidings of cleanliness, discipline, self-control. Not only the boys who are in active training are getting the benefit. They are raising the ideals of all their fellows.

No longer will the small boy do his chores grudgingly, or refuse to do them without a bribe. No longer will lazy parents lay up trouble for themselves and their children by refusing to take the trouble to discipline them. The straightforward command and the straightforward instant, cheerful obedience of it will become a matter of course.

"He is not fit to command who has not first learned to obey" is not only a byword of the army. It is to be found over and over again in the writings of Thomas a' Kempis, gentlest of teachers of religious perfection.

In war and peace, in business and at home, wherever teamwork is needed, wherever self-control and self-respect are worth acquiring and holding fast, there is the necessity for obedience to authority.

Servile and fearful obedience have no place in a democracy. But the cheerful acquiescence which means that every man in the army, every employe in a business, every member of a family is ready to do his rightful part for the good of all, that must be learned by every American.

IDAHO'S NEW SENATOR

President Wilson gained a staunch supporter and the progressive element in congress a new recruit when John F. Nugent was named by Governor Alexander as the successor to the late Senator Brady.

Combining those three requisites of statesmanship—honesty, ability and fearlessness—the new senator from Idaho brings to the United States senate the true message of the West—the message of progressive democracy.

There is one point at least upon which the Republican leaders of Oregon have been able to reach an agreement. They unanimously agree that the clash between President Wilson and Senator Chamberlain is water upon the wheel of the G. O. P.
