SUPREME COURTESY

The story of General Maude's death, which has just been revealed by the British government, is a human narrative so romantic and dramatic, and so characteristic of the British army, that it might have been an invention of Kipling.

The brilliant leader of the British military forces, he considered himself content with discharging his formal military duties. He considered himself a sort of ambassador from the British Empire to the races and tribes of that region. He made a practice of dealing with the natives in a friendly and helpful spirit, carefully cultivating the social amenities customary among them.

In accordance with this policy he visited one day a plague-stricken community. Gen. Maude knew the danger he was running. He was not obliged to go there. But he went nevertheless. When he entered the village he was received with formal courtesy and was offered the "ceremonial cup" to drink. The general knew that one taste might mean death. He had forbidden his own escort to touch food or drink in that place. But it would have been discourteous to refuse the cup. And as a British gentleman, he unhesitatingly accepted the cup and drank. He died of cholera a few days later.

It may seem a useless and foolish sacrifice. Perhaps it is. And yet, such a death may have a more powerful and salutary effect in eastern Turkey than any subsequent military victories which General Maude might have won.

The sacrifice was not lost on the natives, particularly on the Arab tribesmen. They have become better friends of the English, and have fought the Turks more effectively, because of their regard for a gentleman who so respected their traditions that he preferred death to discourtesy.

It is by such a spirit that Great Britain has succeeded so notably with colonial development and administration in the ancient, ceremonious East where races are especially difficult to understand and control. Nobody can imagine a Prussian officer doing what General Maude did. And in that very fact we can see the chief reason why Germany has failed as a colonizing power. In the long run, courtesy is a stronger governing force than the mailed fist.

The Irish question is being settled in the usual way.

MISFITS By F. P. Nutting

A very interesting place is the city market along Yamhill street, from 5th to First street. There you can get anything eatable imaginable, and some things that are not eatables, dogs for instance. Besides vegetables and fruits are numerous novelties, such as home made salads, and Dutch cheese. Things are fresh, at a lower price than usually sold elsewhere, and are right before one for inspection. Anyone can have a booth by paying the price, 25c a day. Among the salespeople are some fine-looking women from the country, among them being Mrs. Pearl Wallace Washburn, of near Oregon City, daughter of W. L. Wallace of near Lebanon, and niece of Dr. J. P. Wallace. There are no eggs along the street that look fresher than those at her stand.

Charlie Warner has started for San Francisco to report at the Coast Artillery headquarters for orders.

ferred by the company from Seattle to Portland. I met him for the first time on Saturday.

A few days ago I met Geo. Taylor, a former Albany housemover, who is taking things easy these days.

Will Anderson, of the Bridal Veil and Wind River sawmills, will soon move with his wife and two children to Bridal Veil to reside. With his auto he will make trips to Portland along the Columbia Highway several times a week. Recently he gave me my first ride on the Columbia Highway, 37 miles up the river, the finest sight-seeing trip in the world. The two mills with which he is connected are large concerns doing a big business. Among other things in process of construction were the material for a large order of boxes for J. Armour & Co.

One of the pleasant things for me is not only meeting old friends, but coming in contact with them in such a way as to reveal the fact of their success. Many of them are making good.

Al Geddes, doing survey work for a Sprout R. R. from Seaside into the hills, and Edmund Anderson with a big timber concern near St. Helens, attended the big convention here in the interest of spruce, meeting with Col. Disque.

I recently met Tom Young, a former Albany painter. He is now one of the guards on the interstate bridge at Vancouver.

Going out of the custom house I met Warren Hunter, a former prominent Albany college student, on his way in with a number of other navy men, after waterfront passage. He is on a steamer and has been at Portland a number of times.

I understand there are a good many former Albany men working in the shipyards, coming here on account of the high wages paid, but have met only a few.
