SINKING SHIPS POLITELY

The strangest thing about the U-boat operations along our eastern coast has been the comparative decency shown by the German commanders.

Apparently the rules of legitimate cruiser warfare, which the United States has always insisted on, and the breaking of which brought us into the war, have been observed throughout this raiding campaign. The U-boats have given our crews fair warning and allowed them to get away in their boats. Generally speaking, they have behaved almost as British or American sailors might behave in similar circumstances.

The commanders have gone so far as to apologize for sinking our ships and to entertain the officers as their honored guests. It is long since we have expected anything of this sort from Germany.

Has the Prussian suddenly changed his nature? We cannot think so. The raid has all the earmarks of propaganda rather than military purpose, and this unwonted humanity is part of the plan. The Hun evidently wants to persuade the American people that he is not so bad as he has been painted—that he is really a fair fighter, and the stories of atrocities committed on the other side of the ocean have been inventions or exaggerations.

It is a clever move, but the American people will not be fooled by it. We know only too well what the Germans have done by sea and land to be gulled by any such trick as this. Huns are still Huns, and will be until we have destroyed their power for evil.

Again we have the government advertising the superiority of "brown rice," and again there is a chorus of baffled housewives inquiring where they can buy brown rice.
