WICHITA AND GERMANY.

In William Allen White's new book, "The Martial Adventures of Henry and Me," Henry tells us what he thinks of U-boat warfare while pacing the deck of a boat in the war zone. What he says is worth hearing.

"I've been thinking about this U-boat business; how it would be if we had the German's job. I have been trying to think if there is any one in Wichita who could go out and run a U-boat the way Germans run U-boats, and I've been trying to imagine him sitting on the front porch of the Country Club or down at the Elks' Club talking about it; telling how he lured the captain of a ship by his distress signal to come to the rescue of a sinking ship and then destroyed the rescuer, and I've been trying to figure out how the fellows sitting around him would take it. They'd get up and leave. He would be outcast, unspeakable, and no brag or bluff or blare of victory would gloss over his act. We simply don't think the German way. We have a loyalty to humanity deeper than our patriotism. There are certain things self-respecting men can't do and live in Wichita. But there seem to be no restrictions in Germany."

Trying to see your neighbors as Germans, carrying out German orders and fighting the German way, brings out stronger than ever the contrast in moral standards of Germany and other lands. Wichita widens and spreads and becomes not only every self-respecting American community, but the whole civilized world.

There are certain things self-respecting men can't do and live outside the Central Empires. But there are no restrictions there, and there won't be so long as the military ideal of conquest and power holds peoples of that benighted region in its grip. When self-respecting men can no longer do these things and live in Germany, the war will be thoroughly won.

SCARING UNCLE SAM.

On the afternoon when news reached New York that the U-boats were sinking ships off the Jersey coast, 100 men enlisted in the naval militia. They said they "wanted revenge." There has been a steady stream of volunteers all over the country ever since, not only for this particular defense organization, but for regular naval service. Army recruiting, too, has been stimulated. And a new fighting spirit has swept through the selective service camps.

There is a new spirit, too, in the shipyards, in the arsenals, in the airplane and munition factories. There is a new spirit in congress. There is a new spirit wherever men work or congregate.

The war has been "brought home to us." And instead of being scared, as the Kaiser expected, we're knocking down more zealously than ever to the job of beating the piratical Hun. Americans, like Englishmen and Frenchmen, don't scare worth a penny.

AMERICANIZING AMERICANS

The war has given a great impetus to the Americanization of foreign-born residents and citizens of this country. Now Oklahoma has begun a campaign for the Americanization of Americans.

If it sounds strange at first just think it over a minute. Before this war the average American had only the haziest—and rosiest—impression of American history. Boys and girls received a smattering of education in the schools about the government. Only the debating teams ever delved far into real problems of national or municipal life. And social problems were left to the specializing college student.

In other words, Americans took a good deal for granted and went their own many ways without any very definite information about their nation as a whole, living, growing thing. The war has made us face a good many of these things for ourselves, without waiting for any organized campaign.

But it is safe to say that there is room in the general scheme of things for the "Americanization of Americans" idea.

It need not be an expensive campaign calling for quantities of literature, public exhibits, etc. It can be carried out in the public schools by a more earnest teaching of American ideals, privileges and obligations along with the school requirements of history, civics, etc. And it can be furth-ered by a sincere determination on the part of every citizen to learn the truth about his country, to find out "how it works" and what is his individual share in making the nation bigger and stronger and truer to its ideals.
