THE FINANCIAL GIANT

All fears regarding the financial disturbances likely to attend the payment of the nation's income taxes prove to have been unfounded. More than $3,000,000,000—twice as much as the government's total receipts for last year, three times the country's entire interest-bearing debt before the war, four times our annual pre-war government expenses, as much as the total internal revenue receipts for seven normal years, was transferred from the nation's purse to the federal treasury without causing a single financial ripple.

In New York City alone the payments amounted to about $800,000,000. Ordinarily the withdrawal of so much money from the banks all at once would have been expected to cause a panic on the stock exchange, with a perilous tightening of the money market and soaring interest rates. Nothing of the sort happened. The crucial day, June 15, came and went like any other day. The president of the largest bank in America remarked, with interest, that the record-breaking payments made through his bank were not even mentioned in his hearing by any employe. They were taken as a matter of course.

The whole thing was an impressive demonstration of the financial resources of the American people and the soundness of our financial system. The United States today is not only a military but a business giant, bearing the most tremendous financial burden ever assumed by any nation or group of nations, and doing it with amazing smoothness and ease.

After this, we need not be afraid of any fiscal undertaking whatsoever.

HELPING WITH THE HOME FIRES

There is one branch of Red Cross work with which every soldier and all soldiers' families should be made familiar. That is the home service division that bridges the distance between the folks back home and the fighting men. This work has its special representative with each army division in France, and will have at least one representative even in isolated camps such as an aviation camp of only a thousand men.

And what does the home service do? It keeps in touch with the men who do not hear promptly from home, who are worried about things that may be going wrong with the family. The home service will use the mails and cables to find out just how that family is getting along and will report as early as possible to the anxious soldier that the insurance has been paid, the sick baby has had excellent care and is growing well and strong, that the rent is paid, etc.

The home service does more than this. It goes to the homes with comfort and material aid, if needed, with advice and encouragement that drive out the blues. As described in a recent issue of The Survey, the slogan of the home service in regard to soldiers' families is: "Write cheerful letters; and if you can't write cheerful letters, come to see us about it." The Red Cross will act quickly and energetically to remedy conditions so that letters of the right sort can go forward honestly and spontaneously.

It is a glorious service, and one as useful in its way as the nursing of wounded soldiers. It is a big help in the preservation of army morale. It is not only helping to "keep the home fires burning," but also to take to cannonments and fighting lines some of warmth and glow of those home fires.
