LAND FOR SOLDIERS

Secretary Lane points out the fact that the United States no longer has a great public domain of cultivable land open to settlement, as it had at the close of the Civil War. Today the land that is left needs a good deal of development to put it into shape. Irrigation, drainage and clearing projects must be carried out if the land is to be made available for cultivation.

The chief need right now, Mr. Lane points out, is for a comprehensive plan and funds to work it out. The nation must know before its soldiers return just where the land worth developing lies, what treatment it needs and how to go about developing it. Then the returned soldier can choose for himself the kind of land he wants to work with. The government or the state must be ready not only to point out available land, but also to help the soldier-farmer in every way with financial loans, scientific knowledge and up-to-date machinery.

This problem of returning the soldiers to the normal daily life of the nation without economic upheaval or disturbance is ours to face now. Past experience has shown that the strenuous outdoor life of the soldier especially fits him for work on the land when he returns to civilian life. Canada and England have worked out successful solutions for their present needs. We can and must do the same for ourselves. It is no charitable arrangement for the benefit of the soldier citizens. The initial expense will be more than repaid by the increase of national resources and the self-respect and happiness of the population.

It is pleasing to note in this connection that Walter Pierce, the democratic nominee for governor, laid the foundation for a constructive program along these lines in his Brownsville speech and it is also worth recording that the same line of thought was followed a few days later by Secretary Lane in a masterful speech made in one of the Eastern states. It is a real problem that calls for statesmanship of the highest order and Mr. Pierce is to be congratulated upon taking the initial step in working out a solution.
