THE REAL SITUATION

Of course there is no American army in France. Foch has no reserves. We cannot send any troops, because U-boats would sink troopships.

We know all this because it is what the German general staff believed up to the moment the last Hun drive started, and what they told their own people.

The inevitable conclusion is that the Crown Prince is now eating his dinners in Paris, and Hindenburg is bombarding London from Calais with a battery of super-atrocity guns.

ANOTHER JOB FOR WILSON

John Dillon, the nationalist leader, in a speech in the house of commons has proposed that the Irish problem be referred to the arbitration of President Wilson.

We may safely say that this particular task is one which the President, however great his desire to do an ally a favor and apply democracy to Ireland, will dodge gracefully but conclusively.

The President happens to have his hands full already, without going out of his way to settle a political-religious-racial problem that has baffled British and Gaelic statesmanship for two or three centuries.
