U. S. LEARNED FROM EUROPE'S FAILURE

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13.—America's success in the world war has been made possible as much by workmen at home as by soldiers in France.

America was confronted by a tremendous task when the conflict with Germany became inevitable. The supplies the allies had required in the years since 1914 had necessitated considerable readjustment of labor and commerce in the United States, but with actual participation in the conflict much greater changes had to be made. The work of American laborers in producing food, munitions and clothing enoch for their own countrymen and the allies as well is one of the greatest performances of the war, or indeed in history of all time. It has been made possible largely by careful organization of the nation's man-power, in order that ever younce of strength could be employed to best advantage.

The United States employment service last June was entrusted with the great task of mobilizing and distributing labor. Something of the kind was absolutely necessary, for without unified arrangements for obtaining the help needed for war production industrial life in America would have been chaotic.

The experience of European countries had illustrated how essential is perfect organization and coordination of labor power toward successful prosecution of a war which places practically whole nations in arms. In the wars of the past, industrial life at home went on without any considerable interruption; the armies in the field were ordinarily not so large that they could not live on the country if they were forced to do so.

With the summoning of millions of men to the colors by all the belligerent nations, however, the world war of 1914 quickly took on a quite different aspect. The withdrawal of all these men from industry proved a tremendous shock to the economic life of every nation.

Germany probably was best prepared for the great change, for the possibility of summoning most of the manpower of the nation into warfare had been considered more thoroughly than elsewhere.

France and England, it soon became apparent, had made serious mistakes. In France, large numbers of skilled munitions workers were called into the army, and they suffered tremendous losses when the Germans overran Belgium and France. Munitions output was slowed up, and only by the most heroic exertions were the French finally able to turn back the enemy at the Marne. Eventually the skilled machinists were called back into the factories, where they could be of much more service.

England had similar experiences. In the patriotic zeal of thousands to enlist, for the voluntary system was retained in England for three years, little attention was paid to the retention on essential jobs of men whose places could hardly be filled. The consequence was that railway workers, miners and machinists, went into the army by thousands and that England's productive capacity was crippled seriously. Only this year England was forced to withdraw 10,000 miners from the army in France.

America was able to profit by these mistakes. From the start she organized a war program on the basis of highest efficiency. The collapse of Russia, shortly after America entered the war, afforded still another object-lesson.

Russia's collapse was due less to a weakening of the front morale than to the nation's trouble at home. Break-down of the nation's industrial life was quickly reflected in the morale of the troops, however. The whole war has illustrated that it is the home army that breaks first. Russia collapsed because the people could do nothing more to carry on the war. Italy was in grave danger of disaster because of industrial difficulties. Bulgaria and Turkey quit while both had large armies afield, simply because the home front broke. The same condition existed in Austria-Hungary and Germany.

BUSY GREEK PEASANT GIRL
Care of Sheep and Goats, and Household Duties, Leave Her Little Time for Dallying.

To the Greek peasant girl is committed the care of her father's flock, which she must lead every day to the pasture and fold at night. The vuskopoula, or shepherdess, is one of the most prominent characters in rural folk song, and many a charming idyl has been composed in her honor. . . . But she has little time for sylvan dallying, for the sheep and goats must be milked, and the milk must be converted into cheese and yiasourti, a delicious and wholesome sour curd, which is in great demand in the town. When the sheep have been shorn, the wool is bleached and spun, and then knitted and woven into garments for the family or into cloth for sale. The cotton or flax grown on the farm must also be gathered in their seasons, and prepared for use. The cotton pods are put through a small hand machine called the mungano, which turns two rollers different ways, and separates the fiber from the seed. The instrument next used is the toxovela, a large bow made from a curved piece of wood five or more feet long, the two ends of which are connected by a stout string. The cotton is placed loosely on the string, which is made to vibrate by being struck with a stick, producing a not unmusical sound. This process detaches the particles of cotton, and it is now ready to use as wadding for the large quilts, which, with a sheet tacked to the under side, form all the winter bed covering used by the lower orders of natives of every race. The mattresses are also usually stuffed with cotton, and the pillows with the husks of Indian corn.
