FOOD IN GERMANY

"Food conditions continue to appear far better than they were reported across the line," says a war correspondent who has entered Germany with the American army of occupation. "The population needs flour, but if the rich were made to divide with the poor there would be no starvation this winter."

This testimony, corroborated by many other reports, tends to clear up the German food situation and ease the minds of Americans about the matter. The Germans are not starving. They have food, not in variety or abundance nor of particularly good quality, but enough to last them several months. They have been begging for food prematurely, partly from fear that their supplies would really live out and partly to win the sympathy of the world and soften the peace terms. As the facts become known, the whining dies down—a phenomenon that has been observed before during these war years.

The allies will not let Germany starve. They never had any such intention. They promised food before Germany asked for it. They will keep their promise as soon as the need arises. For the present, the matter rests with the Germans themselves.
If they are efficient, systematic, orderly people they have always boasted of being, they can distribute their last season's crops and their meat supply and get through the winter well enough. Then the allies will see that they get enough provisions to last them till the next harvest.

HAMILTONS' NUTTY NUTTY NUTTY

"IT SURE LOOKS NUTTY around here." That is the expression we hear many times during the day, from our many callers in our Holiday Nut and Candy Department. And we guess they are about right, for we certainly have some display of Nuts, but if they could see our reserve stock of nuts they would express it as completely Nutty. Come as I see for yourself.
