A BIGGER NAVY

Americans have long been proud of their navy. They are prouder of it today than ever before, because of its unblemished record in the present war, and because of its standing in efficiency and power, with no rival except Great Britain.

Neverless the public does not view with complete satisfaction the prospect of going ahead indefinitely increasing the size and power of the navy. It is well, no doubt, to proceed with the completion of the three-year building plan adopted in 1915 and held up somewhat by war exigencies.

It may be well, too, to accede to the recommendations of Secretary Daniels and supplement this with another three-year building program, adding 10 dreadnaughts, six battle cruisers and other vessels of such type as naval experts may determine, aggregating 156 in all.

But the nation had hoped for an early end of armament. It is natural to ask now, "How much longer shall we have to build and maintain such costly fleets?" Warships soon wear out or grow obsolete. Expenses multiply. It there to be no end of this?

Secretary Daniels himself seems hopeful enough. In the same report in the same report in which he recommends the new construction, he says: "The day is not far distant when the world will witness an end of competitive building between nations of mighty weapons of war."

Thus, he thinks, it is the present duty of the United States to enlarge its navy in order to provide a sufficient defense as long as self-defense is necessary, and in order to have a navy proportionate to our wealth and power to contribute to a world-police fleet when the defensive work can be delegated to an effective League of Nations.

Let us devoutly hope that these expectations will be realized. On no other conditions can a continued pill-
