MAKING A NEWSPAPER

In the passing of H. L. Pittock, Oregon loses one of its most successful publishers and a man who has been closely identified with the growth and development of the state for more than half a century. Those who were closely associated with him vouch for his integrity, his business ability and a pleasing personality; and the Democrat joins with these friends in expressing sorrow at the decease of the founder of one of the metropolitan newspapers of the state.

Mr. Pittock, however, is better known as a financier than as an editor. He was the business brains of the newspaper organization which he founded rather than the editorial chief. It was the late Harvey Scott who made the Oregonian a great newspaper and it has since been dependent upon the memory of this distinguished journalist for its prestige and place in the editorial sun.

If the late owner had any weakness it was his inability to sense genius and to attract to his paper an editorial writer who could take the place of the man who made the Oregonian a vital force in the state.

When Mr. Scott edited the Oregonian it was the editorial page that attracted subscribers. Since Edgar B. Piper assumed charge it is the press dispatches, the local news and the prestige won during the time of Scott that makes the Oregonian a good business investment. When Scott was in charge he thought first and then clothed his thoughts in diction which delighted men and women of intelligence and perception. Piper writes but never thinks. He is more partisan than Scott but has none of his ability. He is sarcastic but lacks the flow of words to express his petty personal dislikes in a manner that carries conviction. Scott was more or less of an aristocrat but he was a born Bourbon. He was no counterfeit gentleman. Piper has the veneer of a man of letters but it is of the superficial, transparent, made-to-measure kind. Scott was exclusive, but no one ever accused him of being a snob. He was a staunch republican but at rare intervals had the saving grace of being able to detect ability in those who failed to accept his school of political philosophy. Piper is unwilling to make any such concession. Scott was a big man in a big town. Piper is a little man, who by a queer turn of the wheel of fortune has been placed in a high place. Scott brought breadth of vision, ability and personality to the Oregonian. Piper brought only egotism and self-assurance. Scott was an asset and Piper is a liability. One was a man; the other is a mouse.
