Ants on Peonies.

For a number of years many persons in various parts of the country have complained of ants destroying the buds on the peonies.

To rid peonies of these ants, cut a circular piece of heavy paper or heavy cardboard, about two feet in diameter, and put a hole in the center just large enough to allow the stem or main stalks of the peony to pass through, and then slit from the center to one edge, to enable you to place the circular rim of paper round the plant.

Smear molasses on the surface of the cardboard, and then scatter a little arsenic powder over the sticky molasses.

The ants will eat of the sweet as they go or come, and it will not be long until you have stopped the constant stream of destructive ants from visiting the peony buds.

In some localities similar trouble has been experienced with ants on dahlias, and the same remedy may be successfully used.

If a very thick solution of arsenate of lead is used with plenty of molasses, it will do the same work as the arsenic.

Values Wife at $50.

Whooping W. Va.—"She's worth $50 and I'll pay it if you can find her and send her back to me," said John P. Malone, an Ironton (W.) farmer, who called at police headquarters here the other day and asked the police to locate the whereabouts of his wife, who left him a year ago. Malone is sixty-five years old, while his wife is but twenty-eight.

When Linen Dies Young

The life of linen depends on its quality and strength. Because of the easier methods of the laundry it is apt to last longer if washed in the laundry. Cheap linens sometimes contain 'filler.' Thus, after the first washing, they seldom look as well as when purchased. Cheap linens do not last as long, in proportion to their cost, as good linens; therefore cheap linens are not cheap. Our experience prompts us to urge every housewife to buy only the best fabrics of whatever kind. Linen dies young when it is born weak. All linens, even the best, have a limit of life and usefulness. And they usually go quick when they go. One week they are apparently whole; after the next washing, beyond repair. They have simply gone the limit and collapsed; which, after all, is the best proof of their long service. Laundries, like all other humanly conducted institutions, are not perfect. They make their share of errors, and do their share of imperfect work. But in the light of the foregoing, to unquestioningly place the blame for all torn and worn out fabrics on the shoulders of your laundry is unjust; and no one, when in possession of facts, wants to be unjust. That is why we print facts, instead of fancies. Perfection is an airy that is never realized. But that degree of perfection, which pride and care in one's work make possible, this laundry sustains.
