FAMOUS PEACE TREATIES

By H. IRVING KING

(Copyright, 1918, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

TREATY OF UTRECHT, 1713.

The End of the War of the Spanish Succession in Europe and of Queen Anne's War in America.

On April 11, 1713, was signed at Utrecht in Holland a treaty of peace which closed a war that had been raging for twelve years—the War of the Spanish Succession; known on this side of the water as Queen Anne's war. The question at issue was who should be king of Spain. Leopold of Austria, emperor of Germany, claimed it for his grandson. France had become a mighty power and the nations viewed with alarm a Bourbon prince who might become king of France on the throne of Spain. At once was formed the "Grand Alliance" of England, Holland, Austria and Germany, and, later, Portugal. France's allies were Bavaria and the dukes of Modena and Savoy. Spain sided with France but lacked money and men. This war brought out the splendid military genius of Marlborough and the scarcely less remarkable genius of Prince Eugene of Savoy; and the victories of Blenheim, Ramillies, Oudenarde and Malplaquet humbled the pride and broke the power of France.

Colonies Bore Brunt of War.

In this country the northern and southern colonies bore the brunt of the war. The Carolinas, then one colony extending to Spanish Florida, sent a force which captured St. Augustine but retired upon the arrival of a French army. Further west a Carolina expedition fought its way to the Gulf of Mexico. The French and Spanish fleets attacked Charleston, but were driven off. In Massachusetts, Haverhill and Deerfield were burned by forces of French and Indians and in the heart of the state the people were kept in terror for years by prowling bands who burned and killed. A New England force, aided by an English fleet, captured Fort Royal in Nova Scotia and a colonial army invaded Canada only to retreat.

In Europe the allies had invaded France and the English had taken Gibraltar. The emperor, Leopold, and his eldest son were both dead and the German claimant for the Spanish throne had become German emperor. England, only anxious for the balance of power, now saw a greater menace in Germany than in France.

A French priest, who had been living in England, went to France and asked one of the king's ministers: "Do you want peace? I have come to offer you the means of treating for it," which, said the minister, "was like asking a man suffering from a long and dangerous disease if he wanted to be cured." Secret negotiations were begun and in January of 1713 a general conference was opened at Utrecht. England and France came quickly to terms. In America England was given Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, Hudson's bay "and its shores," and the territory of the Five Nations in New York. But negotiations between the other powers became tortuous and dragged along. The envoy of the German emperor became so insulting that he was forbidden to come more to the conference. The conduct of the Dutch had pleased neither England nor France and the Dutch delegates were mercilessly snubbed. "Gentlemen," said one of the French envoys, "we come to treat of peace among you, for you—and without you."

Truce Between French and English.

There was a truce between the French and the English but fighting went on between the Germans and the French. Germany began to split up, Prussia being the first to desert the emperor. The spring of 1713 had now come and England fixed the month of April as the very latest date at which a peace must be signed. On the eleventh of that month a peace was signed between Prussia, England, France, Holland, Savoy and Portugal. The duke of Savoy and the elector of Prussia were recognized as kings; and Sicily (later changed for Sardinia), assigned to the former. Louis recovered Lille and other towns in northern France and kept Louisiana. England retained Gibraltar and Minorca but Austria, with such German states as adhered to her, held off until the next year, when she came in and accepted the treaty with some modifications which gave her the Spanish Netherlands. Holland got nothing and her influence and importance in Europe was ended.

The treaty of Utrecht "closed the series of universal wars for the balance of power," says Bancroft. To Americans the thing of deepest interest about the war it ended is the fact that a struggle to decide whether a Bourbon or a Hapsburg should be king of Spain drenched the soil of Massachusetts with blood and brought Charleston under the fire of a hostile fleet.
