WAR-TIME RAILROADING

R. H. Ashton, president of the American Railroad association, in a recent speech remarked that concentration of the railroad lines under government control had been a good thing for the nation, under the circumstances existing.

He is strongly opposed to government ownership, and to continued government control, as are nearly all the other big railroad men. But he frankly admits that government control served a very useful purpose during the war, and sees no advantage in denying it, now that the emergency is over.

This is a point often lost sight of by those who, in their perfectly reasonable opposition to government control, go to the unreasonable extreme of denying that such control can ever be advantageous. It might as well be admitted that unification and centralization of the railroads under federal authority was the only thing that could have overcome the transportation chaos and made possible the handling of troops and military supplies along with the ordinary commerce of the country. If the United States ever gets into another big war the roads will probably have to be handled in about the same dictatorial way. In normal times, of course, it is a different story.

The government has 8,000 tons of caustic soda, 2,700 airplanes and 65,750,000 gallons of pickles to dispose of. Better send them right over to the peace conference. Nobody but an expert could dispose of a mess like that.

PARKING SPACE

The lack of adequate parking space for automobiles in most localities is rather amazing when it is considered that these vehicles abound far in excess of any conveyance ever known to man, and that modern business life and recreation have been so greatly enlarged and facilitated by them.

One enterprising town which hopes to draw automobile trade has seen this lack and supplied it.

Not too far from the center of town to be available, a large plot of land has been reserved for automobile parking. Attendants are engaged whose duty it is to watch the cars. Now the man who comes to town on a business mission, or brings his family in to the movies or to listen to the band concert, has a place to leave his car. More than that, he knows it will be safe from theft, and will have the top raised if a sudden storm blows up, and that he runs no risk of a fine or arrest because he has unwittingly defied traffic rules.

Such provision not only affords a satisfactory arrangement for the car owner. It leaves the downtown streets free from the congestion which results in the general parking of cars along them.

Faced with requests for appropriations totaling $8,000,000,000, congress has begun to figure on new plans for financing. It has even been whispered that it may prove wise for the government to float another loan. Three cheers! Sounds like old times. The bonds we have are getting better every day, and by the time the last ones are paid for we are all going to wish we had a lot more.

Aristocracy dies hard. Just see what this weather is doing for the corn kings.

It is reported that the daughter of the president of China may marry the former Emperor. Now if the Crown Princess of England will marry a Sinn Feiner, and the Kaiser get a job valeting for Clemenceau, democracy will really be on the way.

A prize bull was sold at Buffalo the other day for $135,000. The bears will have to go some if they want to control the market.

Germany now says that she was defeated by Wilson's Fourteen Points. Made her bed herself, and how she lies on it!

Live lobster is now being shipped to inland towns by airplane. Well, lobster always did come high.

Returns From Portland—

W. H. Klum, one of the oldest pioneers of Lebanon, was an Albany visitor this afternoon on his way back to his home at Lebanon from a business trip to Portland. Mr. Klum recently sold part of his farm at the foot of Peterson Butte and moved to Lebanon, where he has a pleasant home.

Farmer From Shelburn—

R. W. Moses, one of the leading farmers of Shelburn, was an Albany visitor today. Mr. Moses reports crops as being excellent in the Shelburn neighborhood.
