WORK FOR THE LEAGUE

The peace treaty is recognized, even by its friends, to be imperfect and inconclusive. President Wilson himself admits that it contains many unsatisfactory compromises, and probably commits many injustices in the adjustment of conflicting interests.

It is this very imperfection and inconclusiveness that now appears the strongest argument for a League of Nations. The peace conference could not finish its work. It found the task too great, complicated by too many rivalries and containing too many uncertain factors. A final, permanent settlement would have called for superhuman wisdom and foresight. The conference therefore, recognizing its own limited wisdom, seems to have reconciled itself to drawing up the best tentative arrangement it could in the circumstances, laying down certain broad principles of policy and leaving it to the future League of Nations to interpret them and put the professed principles into practice.

Thus the task of reshaping the world, instead of being pronounced complete at the end of six months' deliberations, is left to be worked out in the course of decades by a body which the peace conference evidently regarded as heir to its purposes and powers.

According to this view, the League of Nations is the logical and necessary successor of the Paris conference. It is to carry on and finish the work there begun, amending little by little the mistakes and injustices and adapting the principles of the settlement to new conditions as they arise.

This is something quite distinct from the vision of international brotherhood generally associated with the idea of a League of Nations. Its practical nature will commend it to many people who remained cold to the more idealistic conception.

If it works, it will serve both purposes, knitting the nations closer together and eliminating the spirit of warfare at the same time that it accomplishes the concrete objects of the present war settlement.

Possibly it will not work. Possibly human nature is still too weak, selfish and shortsighted to make it work. But if it will not, with all the hopes of an overburdened world to buoy up the workers, what will? If it cannot be made to work, what hope is there for civilization?

NOTICE TO BRIDGE CONTRACTORS
