STRENGTHENING AMERICAN MANHOOD

Whatever may be the defects of the compulsory army training bill submitted to Congress, it certainly has one conspicuous merit. There is no militarism in it.

Boys would be taken as they reach the age of 19, and given three months' training in cantonments that were used during the war which will serve admirably for that purpose. It is likely that the training period would come at the time of year best suited to the recruits—city boys generally, and especially high school and college students, using the summer months for that purpose and farmer boys the winter months.

The training would naturally be intensive, to obtain the biggest results possible; but needless to say the boys would not be worked to death. The spirit and method of instruction would probably be much like that of the voluntary officers' training schools established in the early part of the war, which provided so much good officer material for the national army. And most of the boys would enter upon the work very much as did the civilians who attended those training schools, enjoying the outdoor life and novel environment, and regarding the experience as a sort of vacation, combined with a course in physical development and military education.

There is no question as to the whole some results obtained by three months of systematic exercise and discipline in the atmosphere of an American army camp. Almost any lad who has been graduated from a cantonment in the last two years can furnish eloquent testimony in favor of the institution—if not by his words, then by his general physical and mental improvement, and his broader and more patriotic outlook.

Something along the line now contemplated, made obligatory for every American youth able to stand it, would be an excellent thing for the vigor and stamina of the nation hereafter, quite aside from any question of military defense.

BIG TAKE OF HONEY IS MADE BY ALBANY APIARY

Dr. George Collins has just finished taking the honey from the season's production of his bees. The busy little insects produced 8,500 pounds of clear, sweet honey this year, 60 colonies working faithfully to pull down the H. C. L. and setting an example for industry before their human co-workers without even a buzz about higher wages or better living conditions.

Dr. Collins keeps part of his bees in Elkins Addition and part of them on a farm three miles north of the city.

From one colony he took 338 pounds, or about $100 worth of honey, and several others did as well.

Dr. Collins takes good care of his bees and gets the most from their labor. Mr. Pennington, recently from Ontario, who purchased the farm of George Weisman, got an average of 200 pounds per colony, his stands being located near some fine fields of alfalfa clover.
