TOO NARROW ROADS ARE DANGEROUS

Photos Illustrating Danger of Passing on Narrow Highways. N

The accompanying illustration furnished by the National Touring Bureau of The B. F. Goodrich Rubber Company tells its own story.

Every autoist and truck driver, at least, knows exactly what the two illustrations mean. The photos typify an experience which is common on a large percentage of the roads of today.

The upper picture shows a medium weight auto passing a 2 1/2-ton truck on a fourteen foot highway. Note the small margin of space between the two machines. The outside wheels of the cars are practically on the edge of the pavement with only a few inches of clearance between the two machines. In the lower picture is shown the same machine passing the truck on an eighteen foot roadway. The element of danger in passing has been reduced to practically nothing.

You will note that the photographs have been taken on a perfectly flat roadway. A crowned roadway makes the passing on a fourteen foot width even more dangerous.

The narrow roadway saves money in construction, to be sure, and it was all right perhaps in the days when there were no more than two or three million motor vehicles in the United States, but that day is past. There are more than seven million motor vehicles in the United States now and on a good many of our highways, this amount to a double stream of traffic. A narrow pavement serves one-way traffic, but it cannot serve safely two-way traffic.

Statistics show that a large proportion of the accidents, especially those after night, occur between passing machines on a narrow pavement.

The rate of increase in the number of automobile registrations each year since 1916 points to more than fifteen million more vehicles by 1925 if the same pace is kept up. We might just as well begin now making our new roads wider and safer to take care of congested traffic conditions ahead.
