BERRY BOOM LASTING ONE

Other Booms are Superficial, Running out After Time,
is Statement

We have all read of mining booms, oil booms and land booms and we have seen these booms make new cities over night and turn barren country into prosperous communities.

We are now in the midst of a berry boom. Instead of the danger of a collapse at a later period, such as follows many booms, there is only prospect for a continued and growing demand for berry products.

The reason for this is simple. The rest of the world has never been able to get such berries as are grown in western Oregon and Washington because we were never able to ship the green fruit any great distance in good condition.

With the development of the fruit juice, preserving and jam plants, conditions have changed. Single firms like the Phex Products Co. have been spending hundreds of thousands of dollars advertising berry products nationally.

Hundreds of millions of people who never had a chance to eat berries before are now able to get them in many delicious forms.

The result is that the demand is growing faster than new acreage can produce. This demand will constantly increase. People eat all the time and fruit products are one of the main articles of diet.

For this reason the so-called berry boom is not a boom at all as most booms go. It is simply the delayed development of an industry that is needed very badly to help feed the world.

Increased acreage of strawberries, logan berries and raspberries is sure to bring the grower very profitable returns for years to come and it is a question whether we can produce enough to supply the world trade that is developing.—Criterion.
