RESIDENCE OF JOHN THE BAPTIST WHILE ON THE ISLAND OF PATMOS

Golden Text—Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, today, yea and forever., Heb. 13:8.

For nearly six months we have been watching the gradual dawning of a day. The first rays of light were seen when Andrew and John heard John the Baptist say, "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world!" and followed Jesus to the booth or tent where he was staying. At first he was just a new and wonderful teacher, on whose words they hung breathless, then gradually they began to see that he was more than a man, and they began to hope that it might be he who would restore their nation and become a national king, with perhaps some dim idea of the peace that might come to the world as the result of his wonderful life. But at the crucifixion, all these hopes were eclipsed under the cloud of despair that gathered round the sepulcher in the villa-garden of Joseph of Arimetha.

But with the resurrection, and ascension of Christ, these clouds had been dissipated, and from that time the spiritual conception of Christ and His kingdom had been growing year by year for more than fifty years. Tradition says that in his later years, the apostle John took up his residence at Ephesus, where he was overseer or superintendent of the churches in the vicinity. His last years were darkened by the persecution of the Christians under the emperor Domitian, to which he alludes in the lesson of today as the "tribulation." But steadily, in spite of all the persecutions that beset the church, the death of his colleagues, and the occasional defections of the members, the conception of the Christ had been growing more and more glorious. This is the climax. The humble Galilean peasant has become a mighty and awe-inspiring figure. Taken as a literal, physical being, manifest to the physical eye, the person described could be nothing but a grotesque monstrosity, but taken as the picture of the final triumph of Christ and his church, it is a description of wonderful power. The "son of man," the glorified Christ, stands in the midst of the candlesticks, which represent the churches, showing that in the thought of John, while the physical Christ had vanished from the physical vision, the spiritual Christ was never absent from His church. And if we have the spiritual Christ with us continually, what would we gain by a physical "second coming?" It is a symbolical figure of judgment that John sees. His head and hair are white, signifying righteousness. His eyes are a flame of fire, to search out evil both within and without the church. His feet are burnished brass, and with them he will trample down his enemies. His voice is as the sound of many waters, the continual roaring of which will terrify all who oppose Him. He holds the seven stars, (the churches) in his right hand, the hand of power, and out of his mouth comes the two-edged sword with which he will slay his adversaries. Notice that the right hand of physical power is used for the protection of his church, and that the sword with which he conducts his warfare is the spiritual sword of the "word that proceedeth out of his mouth."

Facing an empire arrogant, brutal, showing a fiendish bitterness against all righteousness, John dares to say in a figure that they who "pierced" the Christ, and have since crucified him afresh in the person of his followers, shall see him glorified with a power sufficient to crush his enemies, and protect his followers. It was a message that the church sorely needed. The persecution was affecting it sadly. Some, under the pressure of torture or the dead weight of the idolatry and sin about them were slipping back into the old life. It was such a small thing to take a pinch of incense powder and offer a libation to the image of the emperor, and it saved so much affliction and trouble. And the memories and associations of the pagan temples still lingered in the minds. The pagan festivals and the "meat offered unto idols" had trapped not a few. John would remind his readers that evil in the church was as much the subject of the judgment of God as that without the church. And he would encourage the faithful ones by telling them that the wicked empire of sin was not all powerful. The cross had become a throne. There has been large exposition of the meek and lowly qualities of Christ, and too little of the strong elements of his character. The conventional picture of the suffering Jesus, crowned with thorns, with reed-scepter, despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrow and acquainted with grief, has almost crowded the picture of the strong purger of the Temple swinging the whip of cords, and driving the grafters out of the Holy Place. For every one of us there is large room for growth in our conception of the sterner, stronger characteristics of the Christ. The spiritual majesty, the terrific hatred of wrong, the unyielding opposition to all evil, the power of limitless endurance which he showed ought to be seen in greater measure in the lives of his present-day disciples. Before this Christ, no entrenched wrong can stand. The spirit of the martyrs was a constant enigma to the Roman of that day, as it is to the worldly man of today. The Christian told the Roman that his gods were no gods, and the Roman took his goods, but the Christian told of wealth that was beyond the reach of the emperor's servants. He rebuked the pagan for his sins, and the Roman retaliated by bodily persecutions and torture, even death. But the last breath of the Christian was one of perfect trust and confidence in the Christ who had prepared a home of eternal peace and joy for all those who were faithful unto death. No wonder that the might of imperial Rome bowed before the majesty of such a character. But when the church became physically stronger, and took the sword in its right hand, and attempted to crush its enemies by physical force, then it failed. A literal interpretation killed, where spirit should have kept alive.

If John were writing an ideal description of the Christ today, would it be the same as we find in Revelation? Christ is the same yesterday, today and forever, but has our ideal conception of him change in the last nineteen centuries? Instead of the king in his majesty which was so attractive to the Oriental of the times of John, we today would rather picture the Divine Servant in the garb of the laborer, instead of the garb of the priest, with his brow wet with sweat, as he ministers unto the needs of his people. And the weapon of service is after all the one which will eventually overcome all opposition, and place the Christ on the throne of human thought and human love.
