THE BOOK OF THE REVELATIONS HAS PERMANENT MESSAGE FOR ALL AGES

(By Rev. J. C. Spencer)
The Heavenly Hope
The book of Revelation had an immediate message for the people of its own day, and a permanent message for all ages. The former is necessary to give under veiled imagery, lest the keen eyes of Roman spies should see in it some further attempt to overthrow the government, a thing which always lay near to the fears of its officials, hence we have the visions of the beast and the scarlet woman, and the symbolic numbers. The message to the people of his own day is made by the writer to be one of comfort. It was the time of the "tribulation," not simply, but a time of special persecution, such as was visited upon the church periodically during the first three centuries of its history. John wants the church to know that they who endured persecution for Christ's saks, were undergoing the first three centuries of its would result in perfect purity of soul. He would lead them to regard their own integrity and Christian fellowship as of far greater value than the wealth of which they were despoiled, or than their bodies which were racked and tortured, or even their lives which Rome was crushing out by the thousand. He would have them to be courageous in the face of the emperor and his savage officers, by revealing to them the peace and plenty of the life that awaited them after death. And indeed, to the amazement of the self-indulgent Romans, they welcomed persecution, and rejected in death as the gateway into the eternal bliss where they should never hunger, nor thirst, nor faint with the heat, nor die, nor sorrow any more. What a life of beauty and joy and peace is spread out before the eyes of the stricken Christians of John's day. All the rich and varied imagery of language, siezed upon by a vivid Oriental imagination, is exhausted in the effort to picture the condition of spiritual happiness which awaits the faithful after death. How often must they have prayed for release, that they might be with Christ.

Heaven on Earth
But they gradually came to realize, what the Christian church since then has been realizing with increasing clearness, that the heavenly condition need not be delayed until after death, but that in the very midst of the sufferings of this life we may have the joy and peace of perfect fellowship with Christ, which is the essence of the heavenly existence. This is the message of the second part of our lesson, the permanent meaning and value of the entire book. "The tabernacle (dwelling-place) of God is with men." The very lives of the saints of old, as they watched for the coming of their Lord, and longed for release and the eternal life, has helped to make this vision real, for just because their eyes were fixed on the life beyond the grave, they were untouched by the strifes of their day, unstained by its sins, and developed a character unspotted by the world. "Heaven came down, their souls to greet." The kingdom of God was coming on the earth through them. This is a long historic process, not to be accomplished by a sudden cataclysm, as the early church believed, nor to be wrought out by arbitrary power of God, by which he should reorganize society irrespective of the efforts of men. For that reason it is as vital today as ever. Truly shall the tabernacle of God be with men, but only as men by God's grace become fit to be the temples of his Spirit. "All things are new," not in the future life, nor as the result of an almighty faith but because men toil with God, giving and sacrificing in a divine-human fellowship of service. And because the ideal has not by any means been realized yet, it is still before us, pregnant with appeal to the entire church. There is much to be made new. While there are thousands of undernourished children in our schools, other thousands of child slaves in our mills, other thousands of girls disappearing from their homes each year, we have ample cause to pray and work that the vision of Seer of Patmos may be realized.

Give Them a Chance To Work for You, Too.
Oren Anderson, of Waldo Anderson & Son, sells a lot of Maxwell and Chalmers automobiles during the year. In the course of business a great many used cars are taken in on payment. Anderson does not worry about disposing of these. He simply puts an ad in the classified columns of the local papers and lets them do the work. The other day a Democrat reader, in answer to an ad, called to look a certain car. "I could have sold six more like it since putting in that ad," Anderson told him. You can buy or sell anything through the classified columns of the Democrat.

Sheep Reported Diseased.
SALEM, Or., March 19—Considerable scabies has made its appearance among the flocks in parts of Benton Linn and Marion counties and a general dipping of all sheep affected will be undertaken early in the spring according to an announcement made here today by Dr. W. H. Lytle, state veterinarian. Dr. Lytle passed Wednesday at Corvallis and while there discovered a number of scabby sheep.
