YESTERDAY---

From the beginning up to the present time, the methods employed by the farmer have been most primitive.

He has had only one kind of power with which to work.

The power of the horse.

The horse: sure but slow—his power measured by his strength, and his ability by the time he can pull.

The farmer's ability to produce depended on the power of his horse.

In plowing an acre the old way the farmer walked eight miles.

In plowing a square mile, one man and two horses walk five thousand two hundred and eighty miles.

It is shorter to walk around the Earth at the Equator than to follow a plow turning a tract of five square miles.

To plow three townships, the plowman must walk sixty thousand miles farther than from the Earth to the Moon and back again.

These figures give one an idea of the energy and time and effort spent in the old way of farming.

The farmer produced, it is true, but he had to struggle for results.

He worked hard and painfully.

His lot has been heavy and his days long. His work has been never-ending.

But all that belongs to YESTERDAY.
