REWARDED

"The friends of Jim Godfrey scattered about the state will be glad to learn that he has secured a position in the federal service, the position being that of agent in the income tax department, with headquarters at Portland. This is a new position, created with the passage of the bill, and carries a salary of $7 a day and $4 a day in lieu of expenses.

"Jim Godfrey and the present editor of The Messenger pooled their fortunes, which consisted principally of Democratic hopefulness and an optimistic view of the future which in one but a Marion county Democrat possessed, and launched The Messenger in June, 1912, and since that date have been handing out real Jeffersonian 'stuff.' The Messenger has not been very large in size or number of pages, and our bank account was not always as large as we often wished. But it was always Democratic in every fibre, which fact covered a lot more sins than we were guilty of in other directions. And it is now the earnest hope of The Messenger that Jim, a prince of Democrats, (if there are any Democratic princes) will have smooth and easy sailing in his new work, fully realizing that no man in the state is more honest and deserving, and, as to his Democracy, as before stated, he is the prince of Democrats. May his life be long and his tribe increase."—Oregon Messenger.

A TRIBUTE TO POVERTY

The following obituary which appeared in an Iowa paper so impressed the writer that we reprint the same in the editorial columns of the Democrat:

"In the bustle and rush of everyday life existence we are prone to pass by as common-places the beautiful things—and the tragedies of life. When the grim reaper claims a victim, there is no pause in the hurrying ranks. The world asks, 'How much did he leave? What position in society did he hold?' And alas for the memory of the man who had neither money nor prestige. He is soon forgotten. Such a man was little Scotty. The world called him 'only a bum' but those who by any chance had gotten a glimpse of the man's better nature knew that at heart Scotty was a gentleman and possessed some of the finest of human traits.

"Years ago, when but a lad, the writer remembers on his father's farm, Scotty at work in the harvest fields. When the hard day's work was done and still twilight was creeping over lawn and grove, the family would gather on the front porch and listen to the songs and stories of the hired man. With wide eyes we children would listen to tales of adventures, and we thought Scotty a wonderful man. He told of strange stories in foreign lands and of the great ships which sailed like giant birds with outstretched wings over the briny deep. He told of the fatherland and his boyhood associates who had romped and raced with him over the dewy meadows of old Scotland. Invariably the reminiscences made him sad, and in the most plaintive tones imaginable, Scotty would sing the songs of long ago.

"How vividly the scene is recalled. It seems but yesterday. The chirp of the crickets; the sound of galloping hoofs of frisky colts in a neighboring meadow; and the touching tones of the little Scotchman as he sang 'Annie Laurie,' and 'The Ship That Never Returned.' Although in our childish innocence we knew nothing of the bitter experiences of life, we instinctively felt that there was a tragedy connected with the life of the man who sang. And we think so still.

"In late years the demon, whiskey, became the man's master, and he resorted to the age-long practice of drowning grief in drink. With no past to recall with pleasure, and no promise in the future, Scotty became a drifter, a derelict in the walks of life.

"Last Monday evening while wandering the streets in a drunken stupor, the homeless man reached a forsaken alley and lay down to rest. For Scotty was tired. Tired of the buffeting of a hard world; of the whips and scorns of time. The fates had been unkind to him, and the weary soul longed for rest. Perhaps he did not know it was to be his last long sleep, and that mother earth was so soon to welcome the wanderer home. No living relatives were there to lessen the anguish of the throes of death. Only the sighing winds of Heaven moored a funeral requiem as the spirit of the dying man waited its way into the vast mysterious unknown. 'Only a bum,' we say. 'A wrecked life'—but stop, we must not judge. We can only say with Burns:

"O death! the poor man's dearest friend,
The kindest and the best!
Welcome the hour my aged limbs
Are laid with thee in rest."

A. C. SCHMIDT TELLS OF REGIONAL BANK HEARING

Gives Out Interview to Democrat in Which He Compliments Secretary McAdoo.

The following interview was given out to the Democrat by A. C. Schmidt Saturday.

"The hearing for the purpose of obtaining a Regional Reserve Bank for Portland was held in the federal court room in the old post office building in Portland, and began promptly at 9.30, and continued until 4.30 p. m. Nearly all the Portland bankers were present, as well as representatives from out of town banks from all over the northwest, including all Oregon, Idaho and Eastern Washington, at 730 o'clock in the evening a banquet was held, at which between three and four hundred guests were present.

"The principal characters at both meetings were Secretary Wm. G. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, and David F. Houston, secretary of agriculture. Mr. McAdoo is tall, slender, with large mouth and strong jaw, his whole makeup is an expression of firmness and conviction. He is very shrewd and quick to see through a proposition. Mr. Houston is not quite so tall, is rather stout, has a good command of the English language, and rather pleasing in his manner, but less convincing than the secretary of the treasury.

"Mr. McAdoo opened the hearing yesterday morning by declaring to the bankers that what they wanted was facts and not oratory, that oratory usually was not based on facts. Mr. Mills of the First National Bank appeared as the representative of the Portland Clearing House, and gave facts and statistics showing that Portland was the financial center for the Northwest, that the banks of Oregon, the banks of Idaho, and the banks of eastern Washington naturally looked to Portland as their reserve center. That trade followed the course of the streams and so naturally tended toward Portland. The Portland banks had made a careful canvass of the banks in the district, and showed that a large majority of the banks in the three states preferred Portland as their reserve center. Further testimony was given by the representatives from the leading wholesale houses and other industries, showing that Portland was the natural distributing center for the Northwest rather than Seattle, as Seattle was way off in the northwest corner of the district. Portland further sustained its contention by displaying a large map indicating the course of the streams and the direction of the railroads, the evidence showing that this northwest district was a district by itself. That conditions were different here from what they were in California and in the Central Northwest, that this section was still comparatively undeveloped, and that there was in store a great future. The contention was that the district had enough money to take care of enterprises and development that required fixed capital, that such capital should naturally come from the east and other states. The bankers of Portland rather took the stand that they should have a branch of a Regional Bank, and that the main Regional Bank on the coast should be located at San Francisco. The impression given out by the two secretaries was that they would only establish eight Regional Banks at the present time and that additional ones would be organized later on. They also seemed to be inclined to favor the idea of not establishing a Regional Bank in the Northwest, but rather giving this section one or more branch banks, the branch banks cooperating with the Regional Bank in San Francisco. The secretaries would make no official statement of any kind, and cautioned the bankers not to interpret the statements they made as being final or official. The attitude of the secretaries during the hearing was very friendly. Mr. McAdoo is very witty and quite pointed in his remarks, and often caused the audience to applaud and to burst out in laughter.

"Among other prominent men who testified at the hearing was Governor West, and the governor gave a good account of himself and of this state. He called attention to the fact how low the state had grown and developed during his lifetime, and directed the attention of the secretaries to the great possibilities here in the Northwest, and that at some day not very distant a Regional Bank should be located in this section, and that Portland was the natural place for it. He told Secretary McAdoo what we wanted was a square deal, and that Oregon insisted on a square deal in ordinary things, even if they had to send the militia out to get it. Secretary McAdoo assured the governor that Oregon would get a square deal, and that they would not have to send the militia out after them to get it. President Kerr, of the Agricultural College also appeared and gave facts and figures showing the agricultural possibilities of this state. Secretary Houston was especially interested in President Kerr's remarks.

"At the close of the banquet in the evening addresses were delivered by both secretaries. Secretary McAdoo stated that the present Currency bill had been passed for the purpose of liberating the country from the fear of another financial panic such as we had in 1907. He stated that there was absolutely no excuse for the present stagnation in business, with such immense crops as we had this year, and the welfare of the people generally. He went on to show that the financial policies of this country from the very beginning had only been piece-meal and never exhaustive. That they had been simply adopted to take care of the situation for the time being, and that never a financial measure had been enacted that placed our country on a sound financial basis such as nearly all European countries do. He went on to show that hereafter a bank that discounted its paper and been looked upon with suspicion as being in straitened financial circumstances, and that no one bank was able to overcome this feeling. That this bill intended to make the re-discounting of financial paper popular. And that it was the aim to give all commercial enterprises sufficient funds to do their work unhampered, that it was the aim and purpose to make the interest rate uniform. That our present banking system was not flexible enough to take care of the business of the country, that the large reserves held by the individual banks could not be thrown together to take care of the financial needs as they arose during the crop moving season. That under the new bill the government would co-operate with the banks in providing funds, and that the central reserve board had large powers delegated to them which they could use in directing the finances of this nation. He assured the bankers that nothing would be done to hamper them in taking care of the financial needs of their communities, but that the government would be there to help them in caring for the needs of their customers, that they would not be hampered in changing from their present system to the new reserve system, that they would be given time to arrange their loans and their affairs generally. He stated that President Wilson was setting a new ideal for this nation, that he had nothing at heart but the welfare of this country, and that he would gladly give his life in order to help this country, but not only his present life but his lives here he had them to annex. He stated that the people were not inaction and reflection, but that the people demanded that something be done to relieve the commercial conditions of this country. That the poison in the system of the present had to be extracted before there could be any recovery. That the tariff legislation, the income tax, the currency bill and the trust legislation were all drafted and enacted with that purpose in mind, and that when these bills became a law that this nation was on the way to greater prosperity and better conditions than we have ever had.

"The audience was very enthusiastic over these expressions and prolonged cheers followed his statements. There was a feeling of satisfaction and assurance among the guests that the administration would give the country a square deal regardless of party connections."

J. L. Irvine, the local Buick dealer unloaded a car load of cars Saturday.

W. B. Chance left this morning for Salem to attend business matters.
