GOLD NEAR WASHINGTON, D. C.

National Capital Excited Over a Find of the Yellow Metal.

Washington is having a little attack of gold fever, though with more apparent reason than is usually the case with most gold crazes in the East. The government geoligists, it is said, have located eight distinct veins of gold-bearing rock within easy walking distance of the city. The gold beit is about eight miles wide and runs northeast and southwest, following the bends of the Potomac river. It is part of the auriferous deposits of the Appalachian mountains, known in the Virginia section, particularly about Spottsylvania county, since Colonial days.

Between 1829 and 1854 the records of the United States mint show about $1,-500,000 of gold to have been sent from Virginia mines. The civil war interrupted all mining operations. After the war there was an effort to reopen some of the mining properties, but uncurbed speculation worked their failure. Since then it is said that hardly more than $15,000 a year has been sent to the mint from this region

Several senators who understand mining are now said to be taking an interest in some of these eastern properties, and there may be a revival of the industry there.

Professor S. F. Emmons, of the geological survey, says that the conduit road that leads out of Washington to the Cabin John bridge, and part way to Great Falls, is macadamized with quartz, most of it gold-bearing, and some of it assaying as high as $16 a ton. The quartz was taken largely from the adjoining farms. Several stamp mills are working in this neighborhood with fair results. The assays run from $7 to $27, and average about $12 a ton. Nuggets of three or four ounces have been shown as coming from the bed of Rock Run, a tributary to the Potomac.

In the civil war, California volunteers who knew gold when they saw it, are said to have discovered rich deposits near Great Falls, where they were encamped, and they planned, "after the cruel war was over," to return and work it, but they never did so. Perhaps those who made the find were killed in war.—Chicago Inter-Ocean.
