

LUCIAN CUT-OFF SAVES FORTY MILES, 2 HOURS

Of the many railroad projects devised in recent years to save expense and running time, that of the Lucian cutoff in Utah on the old Central Pacific line, is one of the most remarkable as an engineering feat. The new piece of road was formally declared completed yesterday, in the presence of a large number of American railway officials, and when used by overland trains, as it will be in the near future, a saving of two hours, in time and forty miles in distance will have been effected.

The old Central Pacific line, which is now a part of the Southern Pacific system, runs from Ogden to Lucian by a long detour around the northern half of great Salt Lake. To avoid this roundabout journey, engineers conceived this scheme several years ago of building directly west from Ogden and across the great inland sea. The project was at first regarded as absurd, but gradually the officials were convinced of its feasibility and a year ago last August actual work on the improvement was commenced.

Of the new line, about thirty miles consists of what is practically a bridge across the lake. It has been constructed of piles and earth, and in many respects is a feature in modern railroad building. When open for business fast trains will be able to fly across fifty miles of swamp and water and fifty miles of desert without encountering a single curve of moment.

Thirty years ago it did not matter much, apparently, where a transcontinental line was located, provided a way was found to the coast. Nowadays the matter of time and distance is given more attention in the west than ever before, and the improvements for securing quicker and better service undertaken in this part of the country have probably been greater than in any other.—Spokesman Review.
