Eastern People Look Toward Settlement in Oregon

The urge of westward migration did not cease with the covered wagon, according to W. G. Ide, manager of the land settlement work of the State and Portland Chamber of Commerce, who have received word from Arthur Foster, the department's representative in the middlewest, that the old Oregon Trail and the Pacific highway will both serve as the route for farm families on their way to Oregon.

Recently three families left Murray county, Minnesota, by automobile, the Peters, Lokhorsts and Van Edens of that county, starting on their trip to the farms which Mr. Foster has been instrumental in assisting them to choose in Oregon.

Dozens of other families on whom the field representative has been calling are now arranging their affairs so that they may be free to locate permanently in Oregon.

For the next ten days, Mr. Foster will be operating in the farm districts in the neighborhood of St. Paul and Minneapolis, where he has found large groups of families who feel the lure of the Northwest and are especially anxious to investigate the opportunities to carry on dairying where there are mild winters, free from the long cold periods which these experience in the east. Further impetus to the effective distribution of settlers upon their arrival was added by the hearty endorsement which this activity received at the semi-annual meeting of the State Association Commercial Organizations' Secretaries in Portland recently. The importance of obtaining the names of new settlers old friends in the east was also stressed as of vital importance. No better source of names of prospective settlers can be obtained in the opinion of many of the secretaries who find eastern people eager to come where old friends have preceded them.
