

Uncle Sam Drunk Spending Money

Our present government is certainly after the money and can see only in billions nowadays. Do you remember hearing over the radio a few years ago—eight million, ten million, etc. This has seemed to be a forerunner of what has followed. President Roosevelt has certainly "run wild" on spending money to bring back good times.

Simply spending money never did make times good. The reaction far more than offsets the benefit. Individuals have loaded up on booze and imagined they owned the earth, but when the effects of the liquor wore off they found that they had incurred obligations that took years to straighten out. We can see the government in the same light. When this spree of spending comes to an end—which everyone knows is not far distant—the United States will find itself in the same position as the individual—a large indebtedness with only a splitting headache to pay the debt.

After the people of Astoria and Clatsop county raised $100,000 to secure property for the location of a naval base at Tongue point, by request of the government, they have failed to establish this base, turning it down repeatedly. Now they refuse to deed the land back to the donors and also refuse to return the $100,000 paid into the government funds. Their argument is that the site is too small. Perhaps there is not room enough to expend a billion dollars or more, which seems a small sum now in Washington. The mouth of the Columbia river is not properly fortified and the government does not seem to think it should be.

FISHIN'

Even if Mr. Finnegan did turn out to be Judy O'Grady, it's a good story --- and Ladies --- it proves that this will be a great year for fishin'. In fact Friend Husband will even admit that when fish --- YES SIR!!! FISH --- bigger'n cows start running around in alfalfa fields, it's a sure sign, it's a fishin' year.

Of course, the fish the "Old Man" hooks may be a trifle smaller than Judy --- that is the one he brings home --- but even then, it'll be some job to eat it all in a meal or two --- no doubt --- and besides that "he'll bring in flocks of them --- no doubt --- no doubt --- yes, no doubt --- so --- better be safe and have that Modern 1936

Long Alfalfa Best Hay In Lamb Fattening Test

Alfalfa hay proved far superior to oats and vetch for fattening lambs in the recent experiment run at Oregon State college under the direction of O. M. Nelson, director of the Division of the Experiment Station. Alfalfa hay was far better than chopped hay.

The object of the lamb feeding tests was to compare Willamette valley grown alfalfa hay with Willamette valley grown oat and vetch hay; to compare the feeding of long hay with the feeding of cut or chopped hay, and to compare the fattening of lambs shorn with those not shorn.

The 240 eastern Oregon lambs used in the experiment were divided into five uniform lots and placed on the various feeds at the same time. Alfalfa or oats and vetch hay was fed with barley and in some lots cans of molasses and kale were added to the oat-vetch hay.

Weed and grass seeds were largely responsible for the poor showing made by the chopped hay lots. The same quality of hay was used in the chopped lots as in the long hay lots; consequently they both contained the same amount of foreign material. In all chopped hay lots where the lambs could not pick over the hay as well, the seeds would lodge in the lower lip of the lamb and cause ulcers, thus interfering with the lamb's feeding. The mouths of the lambs on chopped hay had to be cleaned out once a week.

The shorn lambs, fed barley and chopped vetch and oat hay, made a slightly better gain than unshorn lambs on the same ration but not enough to off-set the market dockage on shorn lambs.

After 70 days' feeding it was evident that the lots being fed oat and vetch hay were not making satisfactory gains. One of the lots was divided in half. One half was fed molasses mixed with the hay and the other half was fed kale in addition to the feed already being fed. The molasses and the kale caused no increase in the gain per head per day.

Alfalfa fed lambs made a fair profit above feed costs in the 90-day feeding period, though Nelson believes that a little more gain would have brought faster and more economical gains. The experiment will be repeated as part of the present investigations into ways of building a better livestock industry in western Oregon.

Max Rohrbough, director of the Canby high school band, had the misfortune to break his leg while playing basketball. Mrs. Claude Moreland has had experience in band work and has taken charge of the band practice during the regular instructors absence.
