Romance in Battle

King's Mate

By Rosita Forbes

Whether fiction or drawn from the personal observations of that amazingly intrepid woman, Rosita Forbes, it is a rapid-fire narrative of love and adventure—a drama enacted under strange skies and unusual conditions. It is more stirring than any of the other romances which the author has written of the desert, of China or of the Near East.

Our New Serial Starting

The woman drew a breath of relief. They were going to sleep. She would get her chance. In that moment she realized how terribly afraid she had been.

For a long time she crouched in the passage, waiting, damp with anxiety, for the master to sleep. At last, reassured by the man's even breathing, Zurlia crept into his room. The pistols were very close to the mattress whereon lay Menebbie, his face turned to the wall. Swift and silent as a cat the Riffl woman stole across the floor, seized the pistols and slipped out, clutching them in cold, stiff fingers. Her idea was merely to remove the bullet. Then no slaughter would be done. A light flickered from the barren room, and as the breeches were stiff, she crept up to it. It was as she snapped open the second that she noticed the mark. It was unmistakable; a dent across the butt. She gazed at it reflectively, felt it with her finger, and then remembered the whispered conversation between Farrar and the Spaniard. For a moment her instinct was illuminated by something near clairvoyance. Rubbing her finger up and down the chipped metal, she felt it was like the medium through which the plot was revealed to her, but not clearly. She suspected. That was all. The pistols were marked. It might be that the Spaniard knew which one to choose. With clenched teeth she took out the bullet, hesitated a minute, then rammed it into the other weapon. Noiselessly she crossed the houseman's room and replaced the pistols by his couch. When dawn came she was asleep on her mat outside Rosemary's door and there was a smile on her lips.

CHAPTER V.

It was cold on the mountain ledge. A fitful wind whistled through the bushes and the sunrise was smothered in clouds.

Martengo was the first to arrive. He had been drinking heavily and as a result he was sullen. His slight was playing him tricks and his hand was none too steady. Suddenly four attacked him lest he should not be able to take advantage of Farrar's treachery. It was no comfort to know the Englishman would be powerless to hurt him. He wanted revenge. Footsteps sounded below. He forced himself to turn nonchalantly toward the newcomers, but a muscle twitched in his cheek.

Westwyn looked tired. It was a bad business he thought, but being a man of little imagination, he accepted it as inevitable. Methodically he had made every possible arrangement for the future, but he contented neither death nor victory. He looked no farther ahead than the solitary pistol shot which would satisfy the Riffl idea of what was suitable. For him Martengo was negligible. It was merely a matter of playing up to the Riffl in order to maintain his essential authority.

Menebbie, watching the ground measured was more uneasy than he had ever been in his life, but the stoicism of his race kept him silent. It was not fit for a man to show his feelings, but he alone knew how much was at stake. It was he who would bear the news to the sultan and he was aware that he would not return from that journey.

"All is ready, Sidl," said a servant, and the headman, taking the pistols from Farrar offered them, the bullets turned outward to Martengo. He took the scratched pistol, waiting quickly back to his post. Slowly the young hoodlum turned to Westwyn. He would have liked to have expressed something of the unexpressed tumult in his heart. He remembered this Englishman riding by his side in a raid and how he had laughed when a quiet grazed his cheek. He saw him, smoke-blackened behind the guns, bare headed and grinning, blood-trickling into his eyes wildly happy in the tightest corner that any of them had ever been in.

"Allah keep you," he said, and gave this Christian infidel the blessing of his faith. Westwyn's eyes lighted. He held out his hand, but Menebbie bending swiftly, touched his forehead and breast as he would have done before his father.

"Back up," said the Kurd in English. "I'm not buried yet," and then in Arabic, "Insha-Allah, we shall eat together tonight."

"My house is yours," returned Menebbie fervently.

The opponents stood facing each other ten paces apart. "It's murder," repeated Heinz, quivering like a fat, pale jelly in the background. Beside him, Pete was motionless. He displayed less interest than he would have done at a parade, but behind that placid exterior he was considering exactly how and when the Spaniard would die. If Westwyn was killed, the enemy would not live till evening. Pete's face was almost pleasant as he arrived at this conclusion.
