WHAT SHALL WE EAT?

When shall we eat would be a better heading. But the question of what we shall eat appears to be the greater in the days of alleged prosperity. Anyhow, a Baltimore physician, Dr. G. Walker, says the government or state should take a firm grip on the dinner tables of the people and dictate the menu. He asserts that people do not take into consideration the chemical nature of food, but simply eat nice things because they taste good.

We are not disposed to argue with the Doctor on the scientific basis of relative food values for physical and mental health and strength. Fashions in food will have their way. But if we are to straddle a restaurant stool or pull up the chair at our own table and be obliged to think about calories, starches, carbohydrates and vitamins, we would just as soon not eat.

When we eat we want to EAT—not take medicine. When we eat we want to think of ham, beans, apples and milk—not of scientific and chemical processes. We want the joy of eating, of listening to music, or of engaging in cheerful conversation of family or friends—not of "awful possibilities" of failing to balance a flock of calories, or learning an alphabet of vitamins.

So much the better if we do strike proper food values. One may agree with Dr. Walker and his contemporaries. But to say that the state shall supervise the making of our grocery list and poke its nose into our food, or sit at our table holding the club of the law, is far out of the question.

Nature tells the dumb beasts of the field what to eat and what to let alone. Nature would still tell the animal called man, if man himself had not tried to pervert Nature by manufacturing and cooking processes. A dog knows when to quit eating. Man, in the aggregate, does not; or knowing, does not heed Nature's warning.

Eat wisely, according to recognized rules. Be careful of bad combinations. Except in extreme cases, eat what you like. It is not so much WHAT we eat as HOW MUCH we eat that determines health.

It is the same way with recreation. The sick man who says, "Now I'm going out to play for my health," probably will keep on playing for his health, and he may or may not get it. But the man who says he's going to play the game for play's sake, for the thrill of winning, for the sheer joy of it all, will wake up some morning a well man. Play the game because it is the game, and the health will take care of itself.

LINCOLN A TYPE

Capable of being respected, if not loved, by his enemies, was an attribute of Abraham Lincoln.

Just as the people of a nation admired the sterling qualities of Robert E. Lee, of Jackson, Jefferson, Washington and McKinley, so does a nation pause on its speedy way on or before February 12, in memory of the sixteenth President of the United States of America.

In this land of sophistication; in a time when children seem to know so much and learn so young, the whole world has an asset in memory of the stalwart rail-splitter, Lincoln, who was the personification of honest intentions. In history the world has found need of outstanding characteristics, represented in the lives of men and women typical of ideals. In literature and drama it has needed a Shakespeare; in ancient philosophy an Aristotle; in essay a John Stuart Mill; in deep introspection an Emerson; in law a Blackstone; in poetry a Longfellow; in invention an Edison; in daring achievement a Lindbergh. One may insert the names of others, according to his wishes and tastes. In religion it has been a Moses, a Mohammed, or a Jesus Christ, depending, of course, upon the point of view.

If Lincoln does not represent a type to be studied, to be loved, or to be emulated, then there isn't much hope for some of us to be able to leave more than our graves behind.

We like these Presidential campaigns. Considering some of the candidates in the field they remind us that though many of us never have a chance, a whole pack of us have enough sense to become President.

Apropos Lindbergh, America's daily exclamation is, "Where on earth is that boy now?" Lindy is like a chameleon in one respect: he can change his location, his adaption to any place, country or people, and come up smiling. If anybody ever gets to the moon or Mars, it'll be Lindy.
