WHAT SHALL BE REMEMBERED

(A Memorial Day Message)

To remember the good and forget the bad is good as a philosophy, but such reasoning alone will not be enough to advance the cause of humanity. Something more must be done than merely forget the bad. Steps to eliminate all forms of evil is necessary to complete the mission of mankind.

Memorial Day is an annual event that calls attention to the records of those who have gone before. To admit that all was good, all was as it should have been, all was beautiful and perfect, and thus pass tearfully over the past is a sweet sentiment, but it doesn't turn the wheels of progress, nor usher in universal peace, nor quite satisfy our ambitions for future development.

It is right that we should bow down in respect for valor that we should commemorate events that have been turning points in history; that we should lay aside the cares of the present in retrospective sympathy of those who long before have worked and played, laughed and cried, built and destroyed, sacrificed and enjoyed. They, too, looked back upon a sorrowing past, and so on—to the beginning of civilization.

No example of the past can be fruitful except as it may serve as a lesson for tomorrow. The present is always a turning point between yesterday and tomorrow. If yesterday's knowledge, wealth, experiences, emotions, characters and joys could remain intact and be endowed upon each of us now, there would be little room for growth, small ambition to prosper, meagre incentive to learn more fully or live more abundantly. Some trails have been blazed, some facts inherited, a few records open; but in the higher and greater experiences of life, we must have lived and experienced them and have acquired them thru our own tests in order that they may become a part of us. Aside from the cramming of facts and the bits of beauty that have been left to present posterity in song, story, painting, monument and architecture, about all people can do is REMEMBER. And that is why Memorial Day means so much to those who are accustomed to its observance in the springtime. Love springs eternal in memory.

Towns don't just happen—they're BUILT. That's an old saying that bears repetition. If you don't think so, imagine our town without any civic organizations working for the common good, without any government to enforce justice and equality, without any schools building for future citizenship, without any churches fostering morality, without any land or business producing service and wealth, without any transportation facilities or roads, without any individuals giving of their time and money and counsel for the general welfare and progress. Then one can realize what cooperation, money, brains and community spirit mean in the development of our town's economic, social and spiritual resources. It is the combined effort of all of these factors and more that build up a community, and nobody would say that these forces just "happen." They are the result of individuals working together.

Sinclair Lewis is married again, but the chances are he won't live on any of the main streets he wrote about.
