Social Science Solution to Peace Problem

War Not Only Wicked, But Futile, Says Dr. Hall, President of University of Oregon, in Series of Articles

This is the fifth of a series of six articles written for this paper by Dr. Arnold Bennett Hall, president of the University of Oregon, on the problem of international peace. Dr. Hall is an authority in this field, and was one of the founders of the Social Science Research Council of America.

By DR. ARNOLD BENNETT HALL
 President, University of Oregon

There are other ways in which social control in international affairs must be supplemented by the technique of modern science. Some nation may find itself with an expanding population and a limited food supply and reach the conclusion that unless it can expand its territorial limits it is destined to ultimate starvation and national decline. At once that nation becomes a menace to all countries interested in the territory that is conceivably available for the realization of the original nation's ideals of expansion, and international friction and conflict may easily result. But what are the facts? If a scientific investigation, conducted by competent scholars, would produce undeniable evidence that the nation would need additional territory or new adjustments in order to meet the problems of its food supply, it is quite reasonable to suppose that peoples exercising the international social control would not refuse reasonable relief and cold-bloodedly condemn the state to its apparent fate.

Just Solutions Imperative

Under a system of social control in which justifiable questions were determined by scientific investigations, a reasonable and just solution of the problem would seem much more probable. For were the aggrieved nation to appeal to the arbitrament of war, she would undoubtedly secure more than was necessary for her reasonable demands, and other nations, having been convinced by scientific inquiry of the justification of the aggressive nation's action, and eager to maintain the existing status and equilibrium among the states, would oppose with remorseless hostility the appeal to arms. Under such a system, the nations would secure neither peace nor security, while under the effective system of social control, problems might conceivably be solved, national security insured, and peace preserved.

Any attempt to exercise a system of social control in the Pacific basin would be bound to encounter needless opposition, friction, and probably failure, unless it was predicated by a series of scientific studies on the Pacific dealing with food supply, expanding population, sources of raw material, possibilities of industrial development, channels of international trade, racial and religious antipathies, and the fundamental character of the civilizations involved. For without such information, social control would be impotent to adjust conflicting interests and work out the solution of vexing problems in a way that would win confidence, avoid friction and secure the voluntary acquiescence of the peoples and nations immediately involved.

In other words, social control, even though accompanied with effective instrumentalities for its expression, must be based upon modern scientific method and the technique of social engineering, if it succeeds.

Control Must Be Just

Another implication involved in an effective system of social control among nations is that such control must be of such a character as to insure minority acquiescence, at least by such a temporary show of force as will be reasonable and practicable. Any attempt to exercise coercion upon a single state, the ultimate justice and wisdom of which does not appeal to their sober judgment after the passage of time, is doomed to failure.

So there are certain things in regard to which the population of the nations would take an attitude of irreconcilable opposition. Any attempt to coerce them contrary to such nationalistic convictions would result in constant military enforcement, rather than the peaceful instrumentalities of social control.

One of the contributions that scientific research could make to this aspect of the problem would be to make a statistical summary of the types of controversies and misunderstandings which have led to war. A classification of these causes into justifiable and non-justifiable disputes would be extremely helpful. Justifiable disputes which depend upon the interpretation of law or ascertainment of facts, are generally much more amenable to peaceful adjustments in which the nations involved are likely to acquiesce. Non-justifiable disputes involving obvious conflicts of what the nations regard as their vital interests, are much more difficult to solve in a way that will meet with the acceptance of the interested powers.

Subjects of Control Told

A survey of the causes of international controversy, however, will bring to light a vast number of issues, many of which some nations will regard as lying entirely within the purview of domestic power. Any attempt to extend the agencies of international control so as to include the power to settle all such questions would be exceedingly perilous. The framers of the United States constitution tried to establish an effective government over 13 independent and belligerent colonies, found it necessary to reserve to the states all power, authority, and jurisdiction, except where history and experience had indicated the absolute necessity of granting such power, authority, and jurisdiction to the federal government. Even with this scrupulous regard for the rights of the individual states, the civil war proved too great a strain upon the instrumentality of national social control, and, for the time being, social control was broken down and we had a government by military power. If this would happen between the American states, which have so many interests, traditions, and ideals in common, how much more likely would it be to happen between the leading foreign nations of the world that have no common heritage of history and ideals.

For this reason, it would seem a sound principle for procedure in formulating a plan for social control among the nations to limit the subjects of control to the absolute minimum. In fact, there seems to be ground to assume that the only one thing upon which the great nations of the world would be wrought to such a definite agreement as to insure the voluntary acquiescence of any nation against which the collected judgment was rendered, is the elimination of war as a means of enforcing national policy. Recent proposals that leading nations should bind themselves to bring economic, commercial and military coercion upon any nation for the group that aggressively declared war without first submitting its controversy to some form of international negotiation, compromise, or decisions seems to recognize the principle here discussed.

The degree of control here proposed is merely to ban aggressive warfare as a means of enforcing national policy, leaving the nations free to choose the method of amicable solution, that they may desire. In other words, the proposal limits the control to the smallest possible jurisdiction that gives promise of averting war.

Scope Is Narrowed

This, in turn, limits the scope of social control to the one issue upon which the peoples of all the nations seem now to be agreed—the evil and futility of war. If the analogies from domestic development and from the origins of society have any value as analogies, there is every reason to believe that such a program will be successful and that each individual nation will acquiesce in the enforcement of such a program.
