ESTABLISHED POLICIES

Only principles live. It is the principle involved in any transactions that govern its necessity or measures its results. Had this government not been founded upon principles it could not have survived the test of time nor withstood the struggle for recognition.

Consider the great and fundamental questions of civil liberty, such as the rights of free speech and a free press, the rights of peaceable assembly and petition, and to be confronted by one's accusers; the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures. Whence came these? They did not spring from sudden whim, nor from transient passion, except, indeed from the passion for justice. The developed as civilization progressed and the institution of liberty under law became the guiding hand of national unity.

Rights spring from principles, and principles result in policies. We could not say that perfection always has been attained from the establishment of policies based upon principles. But they have been goals to strive for. In government, ethics, commercial relations, international negotiations, or in social and racial contacts there have been gross inadequacies apparent and many inequalities made manifest. These, however, have not been the result of the principles involved, but have been the failure of the enforcement of the established policies.

"HOME-TOWNLETS"

In unity there is strength enough to turn the wheel of fortune for everybody.

Patronage consists of two things: the trade in dollars and cents, and the good will created by friendly relations.

Selling our town sometimes is a bigger job among our own citizens than selling it to an outsider. We are sometimes too near our own resources to appreciate them, and too much a part of our own drawbacks to see them and correct them.

Budget your time the same as you budget your income and expenditures and in doing so chalk up a little time for the whole community's welfare.

If you have a good idea for community advancement don't let your light shine under a bushel. Let all of us in on it. Some have the ideas; others the willingness to put it into effect.

This spring's best fashion hint would be from the police to the women to put on more clothes.

The irony of fate is that strikes have come in our coal fields instead of in our law-making hodes.

All that the average drug store lacks to make a lifetime of beauty, happiness and sustenance under its own roof is a place to sleep.

When you work, work! When you play, play! When you sleep, slumber! When you eat, chew! But when you drink, BE CAREFUL!

Sir Walter Raleigh laid down his coat for a woman. Nowadays we menfolks have to lay out our trousers for our wives.
