WHO AIDS THE CRIMINALS?

"All honest as well as dishonest men know that the machinery of law enforcement is defective and out of date," says the Saturday Evening Post in an editorial on crime. Here is a problem not in politics or academic theory or dialectics, but in practical organization, which is supposed to be just the field in which the typical American citizen is best.

"It is the job and the conditions which surround the job that need attention. If as a people we are incapable of improving the judicial and jury systems, of doing away with frivolous appeals, lessening the grant of continuances, expediting trials, simplifying indictments, and making the other necessary improvements in the actual technic of the job, then we have lost the art of self government."

"The people may have become more lawless or they may not; that is a moot point. In any case, respect for law will not be established by rhetoric. Why not concentrate first on what everybody knows is inadequate and everybod, the institutional machinery for doing the job?"

Expressed in a nutshell, what we need is less laws and better enforcement, more rationalism and less emotion in the handling of crime. More laws restricting the law-abiding on the theory that the criminal will thereby be curbed, merely encourage crime and increase law-breaking.
