CEDAR SHINGLES SHOW RESISTANCE TO BLAZE

A demonstration test carried out by the school of forestry revealed that cedar shingles, an important Oregon forest product, are far more resistant to fire than the common asphalt base substitute roofing. A firebrand made of a bundle of excelsior wet with a half pint of gasoline was placed on sample panels of composition and shingle roofs. The composition roofing ignited at once and burned rapidly, spreading over considerable area in five minutes, while the fire on the shingle panels either went out or failed to spread and burned only weakly at the end of the test period. Both old and new shingles were used.

OUR PUBLIC RELATIONS!

The following letter received by a water company in a Middle West city indicates that satisfactory public relations are more difficult to attain than most persons think: "Dere Water Co.—" "I wish you would send your man to take a leak out of my pipes in the seller, cause it makes the meater cost too much." "Also while your man is there, I wish he would take out that meater and put me in a flat rate meater. I like that kind better and it don't cost so much."

Changes Brought About in Food Associations

Nowhere else, save in these United States, is there such a blend of food resources and contrasting food tastes of different racial strains, writes Muriel Allen King in the New York Herald Tribune. In pre-war, pre-prohibition days, there was great pride in local cookery. Certain dishes were indelibly associated with certain sections of the United States. One went to New England to eat clam chowder, brown bread and baked beans; to Texas to get tamales; to Virginia to luxuriate on spicy baked ham and crisp corn pone. There were, possibly, tea rooms in Boston, Kansas City, or in Greenwich village, which nobody knows today, that advertised "real southern waffles," but the Greek lunch counter had not quite erased the idea that certain dishes were appropriate to certain feasts, that certain foods were traditional mates and companions to other foods.
