INFATUATION'S VICTIM

Complete Short Story

Every time I hear my mention of Hawaii or that dream city which I shall call Wahkoti, I feel first an uncontrolled chill at my heart, then a swift wave of warmth and security, for in that enchanted island's paradise happened three of the most vital incidents of my life, and there I tasted anxiety, loneliness, joy, fear, shame and, at last, peace. My mother died at my birth, and my girlhood was spent on my father's sugar cane plantation in South Africa. When I was only 18 I married Terry Brady. He was a good-natured Irishman ten years older than I who owned the biggest plantation in that section, which, of course meant that he was wealthy. But the much longed for trip to England had to be postponed, for in a year's time little Joy was born. And for five years my time was completely occupied with the joy of her babyhood.

One day Terry came home from a meeting and announced:

"Well, Aileen, it looks like the time for that trip to England has come. I have been chosen to represent the South African sugar growers at the New York convention this winter."

"Miss Joy not so well, Miss Aileen—she kind of hot like."

In a panic I sent for the ship's doctor who assured both Terry and me that it must be only a touch of seasickness, for we were having our first sea sickness, for we were having our first rough weather.

When, five days later, we reached Waukoti my baby was very ill.

At 5 o'clock that evening Terry sailed without me! I felt so small, so terribly alone as I stood on the dock and waved to him.

But by the beginning of the fourth week Joy was up and about and with the doctor's help I had secured an adorable little cottage out near the beach.

I did not at once go into the water but sat on the sands listening to one of the beach boys strumming on his ukulele. Presently he was joined by a young man of striking appearance.

"Well, Onto, are we going canoeing in the outrigger today? he asked the beach boy.

"All right Senior Altivo. I'll be ready for you in ten minutes."

So he was Spanish! I might have guessed it. I glanced back to see him walking up the beach to join a group of young people who welcomed him with every evidence of cordiality.

They needed another passenger, and I was most desperately lonely. If only I had known them! Oh well, I thought resignedly, I might as well take my solitary swim and be done with it.

After I reached deep water, I turned and was floating slowly in to shore, my mind dreaming and only half conscious as I gazed through half-closed eyes into the depth of the vivid blue sky above my head.

Suddenly there was a shout, something cut the water with a swish close to my head and I saw a body hurtling towards me through the air in a dive. I was caught by the shoulders and abruptly pulled beneath the water.

"A narrow escape, that," he smiled showing teeth that, were white and even against his dark skin.

"What happened?" I asked.

"We were riding shoreward in our outrigger canoe and Onto did not see you until after we had started down the crest of the wave directly toward you. I shouted but realized instantly that you could not get out of the way of the outrigger in time. So I dived," he added with a smile as he tossed the water out of his eyes.

Onto had turned the canoe around and paddled up to us.

"And now won't you do us the honor of joining our party?"

"After you rescued me it's the least I can do," I smilingly accepted

That was the beginning of our friendship. During the five weeks that followed I saw more and more of him.

That night a party of us had planned to go to a native hut to a Luau or Hawaiian christening feast. Altivo drank steadily, and for the first time he was able to persuade me to drink too, for I was in a reckless mood. Suddenly I felt suffocated and dizzy and I abruptly left the hut. Altivo followed me.

"What's the matter, querida?" "I think you'd better take me home."

"All right," he acquiesced.

He stopped the car and suddenly he again had me tightly in his arms this time covering my neck and face with kisses.

Slowly my brain seemed to clear, and I pushed him from me and laughed unsteadily.

"You really must take me home."

But not heeding me he kissed me, so violently that he bruised my lips. Realizing he was beyond control, I was desperate to escape. Pretending to relax in his arms, I presently suggested that we both take another drink of okolehao. This suggestion met with immediate approval.

"Now my little English snow bird is warming to the tropics."

He released me and turned to get his flask from the side pocket. Instantly I opened the door and sprang to the ground. Altivo was too unsteady from drink to pursue me, and it was an easy matter for me to lose myself in the darkness of the night.

As I ran down the beach to my cottage I made up my mind that I would not see him again.

The next afternoon he arrived, all contrition.

In the end he persuaded me that it had been the drink. I forgave him and accepted the charm. I remember that it was after this scene that I showed him my husband's telegram. He read it and handed it back to me. There was a glint in his eyes as he said:

"He arrives early Friday morning? I will give you a farewell party Thursday evening. You must have one final happy memory of Hawaii to take back to South Africa with you. I think perhaps you will need it," he said softly.

I looked at him puzzled. "But isn't the party to be at the hotel?"

"No," he shook his head. "I've a surprise for you. We are going over to the Chinese section."

It was now quite dark, for there is no twilight in Hawaii, and as we turned down Luana Street, the street lights were already twinkling.

I almost unconsciously grew uneasy, and presently he turned down a very narrow street that wound back through the houses that seemed almost built on top of each other, so close were they huddled.

As he opened the door I hesitated. "Where are the rest of the party? Surely they can't get their cars in here too?"

"They're already here. Don't be silly, come on."

He looked down at me and (Continued on Next Page)
