Dog's Education Should Start With Proper Manners

If Not a Gentleman, He Surely Will Be a Social Flap.

Is your dog well-bred? This does not refer to his pedigree—although that kind of good breeding is important too—but to his manners. The first thought you should have for your puppy is to make a gentleman of him...

Every one hates bad manners in other people's dogs. Halitosis, body odor, yellow teeth and pimples may cause your friends to shun you, but not nearly as fast as if you own an ill-bred dog.

It is not hard to make a dog obedient. He will respect you much more and love you not one whit the less if he is rigidly trained to heed when called, to lie down and sit on command, to lead without pulling and to behave decently indoors.

Being a native of the woods and fields, he must first be taught indoor manners. Cleanliness in personal habits is the most important, so he should be housebroken first of all.

Table manners come next. Never allow the dog near the family table at meal times. Teach him to expect his own food at a certain time and place every day. If fed a good meal in the evening, consisting of a well-balanced meaty ration, plus a fresh-meat biscuit or two in the morning and plenty of water, he will not be tempted to haunt the family dining room. Horse-meat, the best meat for dogs, with cereals mixed in proper proportions, is now obtainable in prepared, canned form at stores everywhere. Feed, brush and exercise your dog daily.

His relations to strangers should next be considered. The aim is to train him to a general attitude of "friendly reserve," neither surly and vicious nor over-affectionate, towards all strangers. He can learn his guard
